Abner shook his head. "However strong the wind the stork's nests never blow down. They know how to build them too well for that. But they never would know if it were not for the Heavenly Father who teaches them and watches over them."

They were all rested now and began to face the long climb that led up to the high hills that towered above them. They climbed up till they were far above the trees and could look down into the storks' nests in the top of the fir trees, while the houses they had left looked like toy building bricks. Above them the mountain rose steep and smooth as a city wall, except that there was an occasional ridge or crevice in the face of it. While they all stood looking up at it Abner said seriously, "I will give a silver shekel to whichever of you can climb that rock." They looked at it eagerly. A silver shekel was more money than any of them had ever had in their lives. But hope soon died out.

"We can't hold on by our eyelids and we have no wings with which to fly and there is no other way up," they said.

"Are you sure?" Abner questioned, with the same serious look upon his face. "Look again."

They looked once more, but turned back more hopeless than ever.

"But some friends of mine know a way up," he declared, look!" He pointed to the wild goats that jumped and ran on the steepest places and seemed to be able to hold on like flies.

"Oh, the goats," the children laughed, "but we cannot climb like goats."

"But who made the goats so clever at climbing?" Abner asked again; and there was no need for him to answer his own question, for the children knew that God had made them all and had made them clever as well as strong.

It was growing toward evening when they turned toward home. The rose light of the sunset was shining on the gray rocks where the wild goats were still standing dark and alert and the children knew that it would soon be dark. Unconsciously they began to hurry. Somewhere, far off, they heard the deep, loud roar of a lion. The children cried out in fear and came nearer to Abner.

"Let us hurry," they said, "we don't like being out in the dark when the lions are roaring."

"Yet," he said, "you don't mind being out in the daytime."

"No, but there are no lions in the daytime for us to fear."

They had reached the village now. Men were coming home from the fields tired with their day's work, ready for the evening meal.

"Well," said Abner, "the lions come out in the night to seek their meat from God, but when the morning comes and it is time for men to go to their work again the lions will all be back in their dens.' And, as he thought of the wonders of the world which God had made, he added, "O Lord, how manifold are thy works! in wisdom hast Thou made them all."—Canadian Churchman.

The Transfigured Copy-Book.

We older ones recall the days of youth, when the "copy-book" was in vogue in the schools. We used them ourselves. Do you of the same generation remember the little red clapboarded school houses standing guard at the country crossroads, and the more pretentious brick buildings in the little villages?

That old-fashioned copy-book. It is the subject of a little story that we heard not so very long ago from the lips of a Tennessee rector. The event happened three or more decades ago. It presumably found its setting in one of those little red school houses, or mayhap in one of the sturdy brick ones. The boyish owner of that copy-book is presumably a successful businessman now.

Well, here is the story: Just as we all did in those days, Johnnie was struggling with his copy-book, with those wonderful script words at the top of each page, and a number of lines below on which to copy them and thus train the hand in writing.

Carefully and fearfully lest he might make a bad error Johnnie started on the first blank line below the text. Holding his pen just so, the teacher directed him, he labored. The first line done! Fair, but by no means perfect. Then the second, a bit better in spots, worse in some. Summoning all his resources of quiet nerves and firm determination Johnnie struggled on to the third line, and then the fourth.

As he entered upon the fifth, he was encouraged by his improvement, and he became over-confident. Splash! A blot on the fair page. Drying it as best he could, he assayed to rub it off. And bad matters became worse. Still he rubbed and rubbed, carefully, but in vain. The blot was aggravatingly eternal. The eraser finally rubbed through, and what a looking page! Then Johnnie's sleeve brushed against the wet ink, and both the paper and Johnnie were a mess.

Do you fully comprehend what is meant by what we call an inopportune moment? Well, for Johnnie it had come. For just as he had become completely discouraged, and would like to have thrown the copy-book in the old box stove, the teacher came and looked over his shoulder! Inopportune moment! She was a big teacher, one who truly taught her boys and girls to grow in character, whatever they may forget of text-book lessons. But that dreadful copy-book, with its fair start, its uncertain progress and its final collapse—with a blot and a hole! How could she "pass" it?

She lifted the book from his desk, to inspect it a bit more closely. Poor Johnnie! His hour of humiliation had come. For didn't she ask: "Johnnie, is this the best that you can do?" Down went Johnnie's head, lower and lower over the desk. Again she asked: "Is it the best, the very best that you can do?" Johnnie could not trust himself to speak. He gulped, and nodded his head. Yes, it had been the very best that he could do. He had put into that awful page of boyish script every ounce of his best self. Humiliation! Failure!

Then the teacher, great-hearted Christian woman that she was: "Johnnie, if this is the best that you can do, it is grand! It is wonderful!"

And that is what Christ says to each one of us imperfect, stammering, struggling, discouraged and disheartened humans who—and when we—are doing our very best. Remember that, you who are enrolled among the so-called privileged, when you think of the man born and reared amid sordid surroundings from which he has not been able to break loose. Remember that when you yourself have done the best you can and the indifference or antagonism of those about you has seemed to thwart your holy efforts. Let us quietly reflect that nobody knows all about it but the great-hearted Teacher who looks down over our shoulder.—St. Andrew's Cross.

A DEED AND A WORD.

A little stream had lost its way
Amid the grass and fern;
A passing stranger scooped a well,
Where weary men might turn;
He walled it in, and hung with care
A ladle at the brink;
He thought not of the deed he did,
But judged that all might drink.
He passed again, and lo! the well,
By summer never dried,
Had cooled ten thousand parching tongues,
And saved a life beside.
A nameless man, amid a crowd
That thronged the daily mart
Let fall a word of hope and love,
unstudied from the heart;
A whisper on the tumult thrown,
A transitory breath—
It raised a brother from the dust
It saved a soul from death.
O germ! O germ! O word of love!
O thought at random cast!
Ye were but little things at first,
But mighty at the last.

Disciples in Truth.

A great artist was once wandering in the mountains of Switzerland when some officials met him and demanded a passport. "I do not have it with me," he replied, "but may name is Dore". "Prove it, if you are," replied the officers, knowing who Dore was, but not believing that this was he. Taking a piece of paper, the artist hastily sketched a group of peasants who were standing near and did it with such grace and skill that the officials exclaimed, "Enough, you are Dore!"

We must prove that we are followers of the Master by the love, the grace, the beauty, the holiness of our life.—J. R. Miller, in The Glory of the Commonplace.

A BOY'S PRAYER.

God make me a man—
Give me strength to stand for right
When other folks have left the fight.
Give me the courage of the man
Who knows that if he wills he can.
Teach me to see in every face
The good, the kind, and not the base.
Make me sincere in word and deed
Blot out from me all sham and greed.
Help me to guard my troubled soul
By constant, active, self-control.
Clean up my thoughts, my speech, my play,
And keep me pure from day to day.
O make of me a man!

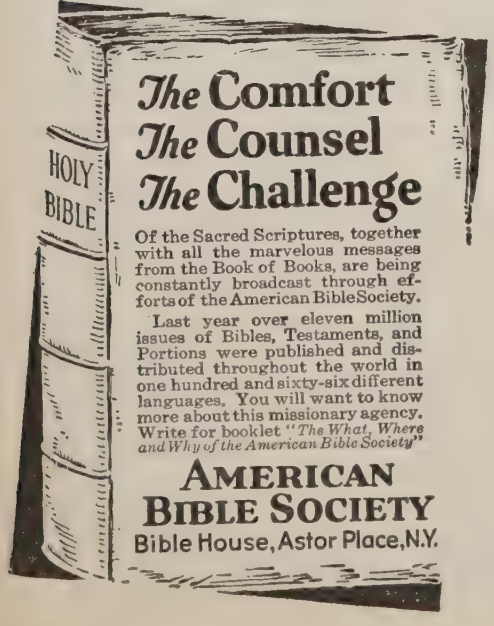
GET WHAT YOU BUY

Monument buyers are in almost all cases interested in securing the very best material. Material costs only about 20 per cent of the price of the job. Hence the percentage of increase for the best material over the cheapest material is insignificant. Besides which, Winnsboro Granite, when specified, returns to the dealer considerable saving in working as it works easier and more safely, owing to the toughness, than most other granites.

The buyer should be sure that the monument purchased is not of boulder stone; is not from some quarry of inferior crushing strength, or larger content of lime, iron and water—all of them injurious. To be perfectly sure, specify Winnsboro Granite in your purchase contract; require the dealer to furnish you a quarry certificate signed by the manager of Winnsboro Granite Corporation; and test the monument by throwing water over it. If there are any flaws, white or black streaks or splotches of size; or if there is wave (variation in the mixture of light and dark crystals) in the grain, some mistake has been made.



Insist upon flawless, even grain, straight grain granite. Only such granite, quarried and graded by Winnsboro Granite Corporation, is dependable as the best; and it is certificated on request.

You can get seconds, known as "Smith stock", but you sacrifice beauty and quality. You can get cheap boulder granite, but you sacrifice beauty and permanency. You can get granite from many other quarries which looks very attractive, but it will not last as well because containing more injurious ingredients—lime, iron, water. To be safe and sure, specify Winnsboro Granite. Have it certificated; examine it while wet.

The honest dealer, eager to please his customer, will be glad to make this test for you on all faces of the monument, and to furnish you a certificate from the quarry, which costs you nothing.

The pleased customer, sure that he gets what he buys, is a living advertisement to any monument dealer.

IN MEMORIAM.

At its Stated Meeting, held on Monday, October 14, 1929, the Standing Committee of the General Theological Seminary feels impelled to express the deep sorrow it feels at the irreparable loss the Seminary has sustained in the death of THE RIGHT REVEREND JOHN GARDNER MURRAY, D. D., Presiding Bishop of the Church, and for some years an ex-officio member of the Board of Trustees of the Seminary.

In this Board, as in all of the manifold relations of life into which he entered so competently and so helpfully, Bishop Murray exhibited constantly that conscientious devotion to duty, sound judgment and fine courtesy which made him such a conspicuous example of the Christian gentleman. His deep interest in the Seminary and its work were frequently expressed in words and manifested in deeds, and no appeal for advice or cooperation was ever made in vain. His very presence in the meetings of the Board was an inspiration and a benediction, and his wise counsels led ever to the heights of broad vision and Christian charity.

In behalf of the Board of Trustees, the Faculty and the Students of the Seminary, the Standing Committee exends to Bishop Murray's family their heartfelt sympathy, and offers the prayer that he may find rest and peace in the presence of that Master whom he loved and served so well.

LAWRENCE T. COLE,
Secretary.

REV. J. W. CANTEY JOHNSON.

THE REVEREND J. W. CANTEY JOHNSON, the fatihful and beloved Rector of St. Mark's Church, Gastonia, N. C., went to the church on Sunday, October 27th, for early Celebration. He was ahead of time. A severe heart attack caused him to go to a nearby hotel for assistance. A physician was hastily summoned and his family notified. Everything was done for his relief without avail. The life had spent itself fully in the Master's service. The end had come.

Mr. Johnson was born in Stateburg, S. C., the son of Rev. and Mrs. Johnson, on August 30, 1871. Was ordained Deacon in 1895 and to the Priesthood in 1896. He married Arrah Isabella Wilson, of Rock Hill, S. C., in 1897. He is survived by his widow and six sons: John A. Johnson, Rock Hill, S. C., Blackburn W. Johnson, Charlotte, N. C., Willis Cantey Johnson, West Point, Ga., Francis B., William S. and Richard R. Johnson, Gastonia, N. C., and his brothers and sisters (all living). Joseph Johnson, Wilmington, N. C., Dr Francis B. Johnson, Charleston, S. C., Henry M. Johnson, Augusta, Ga., Rev. Roberts P. Johnson, St. Francisville, La., Mrs. Stanhope Sams, Columbia, S. C., Mrs. J Campbell Bissell, Sr., Charleston, S. C., Mrs I. G. Ball, Charleston, S. C.

His ministry was spent in Rock Hill, S. C., the Diocese of Louisiana, Roanoke, Va., where as Rector of St. John's Church, for ten years his leadership and labors were material to the establishment of the new Diocese of Southwestern Virginia, and for nine years the Rector of St Mark's Chureh, of Gastonia, in the Dioecse of Western North Carolina, where he was recognized as a leader of outstanding strength throughout his ministry.

Mr. Johnson's worth and usefulness were recognized in his being made the president of the Standing Committee of the Diocese, a deputy to the General Convention, the secretary of the Diocese and for years the head and front of Religious Education the strength of his helpful ministry was felt in every department of the life of the Church and his brethren love to honor him.

For seven years he had been the President of the Ministerial Association of the city and county in which he lived and he was in the forefront of every worthy cause and social movement.

Mr. Johnson was a ripe scholar, having received his academic and theological education at Charleston College and the University of the South.

His was a rounded life—an outstanding athlete, a true friend, a faithful pastor, a spiritual, persuasive and earnest preacher of the simple gospel of Jesus Christ, and executive officer of uncommon usefulness —a Christian of broad and understanding sympathy many followed him in loving confidence. He moved unswervingly along a path of correct and courageous righteousness and never failed to point others upward. He gave his life's best to the service of the Master and was honored and loved by all those who knew him best.

The fight is o'er, the battle done,
The victory of life is won.
Alleluia!

The funeral service was conducted in St. Mark's Church, Tuesday, October 29th, at 10:00 a'clock. by the Bishop of the Diocese, Rt. Rev. Junius M. Horner, D. D., assisted by Rt. Rev. Edwin A. Penick, D. D, Bishop Coadjutor of the Diocese of North Carolina, and by a brother, Rev. Robert T. Johnson, of St. Francisville, La.

Many clergy of the Diocese and others attended, including the ministers of the City of Gastonia. The church could not accommodate the large gathering of those who came to honor their friend.

The active pall bearers were the younger Vestrymen. The honorary pall bearers included the Wardens of the church and Mr. W. L. Balthis, members of the Council of the Diocese, and representatives of the Gastonia Ministerial Association

Interment took place in Rock Hill, where Mr. Johnson's ministry was begun.

Virginia Prepares for Fall Campaign.

Diocesan Headquarters is sending out this month four pieces of literature for use in the Fall Campaign. One of them, "Open the Door of Opportunity" is a folder about the work of the diocese and every loyal member of the Church in the diocese, who would have an intelligent interest in his Church, should read it carefully.

The budget for this diocese for 1930 is $194,800, for ourselves $146,800, for others (that is our quota for the Work of the General Church to be sent to the National Council), $48,000. The above sums total of money is needed to meet the bare necessities of the work which is being done. In order to engage in any advance work of Church Extension $15,000 additional is needed.

Let us bear ever in mind that there is no limit to the possibilities which are open to us. The task of bringing the Kingdom of Heaven among men will require every resource of energy, thought, courage, faith, and money which the Christians of the world can command. It cannot be performed with our spare change or in our spare time. The need is so great that the measure of our giving should be our ability.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. J. B. Cheshire, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. E. A. Penick, D. D., Coadjutor.
Rt Rev. H. B. Delaney, D. D., Suffragan.

Opening of St. Mary's School.

St. Mary's School, Raleigh, began its eighty-eighth session on the nineteenth of September, 1929, with services in the school chapel. An impressive procession of the clergy was headed by Bishop Cheshire, of the Diocese of North Carolina, and Bishop Penick, Bishop Coadjutor. Members of the Raleigh clergy taking part in the service were: the Rev. Milton A. Barber, rector of Christ Church; the Rev. H. G. Lane, rector of the Church of the Good Shepherd; the Rev. Edgar A. Goold, rector of St. Augustine's School; the Rev. H. A. Cox, rector of St. Saviour's; the Rev. R. T. Hunter; the Rev. Warren W. Way, rector of St. Mary's School.

Bishop Penick delivered an address on the importance of the organization of both plan and material in the development of young lives, and on the necessity for originality in thinking.

The number of students enrolled in the school shows an increase over that of last year, both in boarders and day pupils.

MINNESOTA.

Rt. Rev. F. A. McElwain, D. D., Bishop.

Parish House For St. John the Evangelist.

On Wednesday, October 9, occurred the formal opening of the rebuilt parish house of the Church of St. John the Evangelist, St. Paul, Minnesota. This was formerly a building known as the Church Club, erected by this parish to meet what at that time were the needs of the community in which the parish is situated, rather than to assist the parish in its program of religious education and organization work. The need for a community house in this section has passed, and the vestry decided to rebuild the interior and equip it so that it would serve the Church School and the parish organizations. The results are gratifying in every detail, and the parish's work will be immediately helped by the provision of this building.

GEORGIA.

Rt. Rev. F. F. Reese, D. D., Bishop.

Conference of Field Department.

Discussion of methods for the fall campaign was ably led by the Rev. Charles Clingman, D. D., rector of the Church of the Advent, Birmingham, Alabama, at the Annual Conference of the Field Department of the Diocese of Georgia, held in St. John's Church, Savannah, October 23 and 24.

The conference opened on Wednesday afternoon, at which time the topics were on the technique of the preparation and educational value of the canvass. At night a short service was held and the speakers for the evening were Dr. Clingman and Miss Edna Eastwood, Secretary for the Home Study of the Isolated, Department of Religious Education of the National Council.

A celebration of the Holy Communion opened the next day's session, when the Bishop of the Diocese, in his address, emphasized the spiritual side of the every member canvass. On adjourning to the parish house, Bishop Reese presented the Diocesan Program followed by an address by Dr. Clingman on the General Church Program.

After luncheon, divisional conferences were held, the Bishop leading the discussion for the clergy group, and Mr. W. W. Williamson, Vice-Chairman of the Diocesan Finance Department, presiding over the lay conference. The two groups joined later and reported their findings. A resolution was passed at the joint conference recommending to the parishes and missions the adoption of the "individual apportionment plan" after a thorough preparation is made informing the congregations of the proposed plan.

Additional interest was lent to this year's conference as the first day was Bishop Reese's seventy-fifth birthday. At the evening service, the Rev. D. C. Wright, D. D., rector of Christ Church, Savannah, representing the clergy and lay people of the diocese, made a gracious and graceful address, expressing love and congratulations to the Bishop, and appreciation of his wise and statesmanlike administration and spiritual leadership.

The following evening, Bishop Reese's daughter, Mrs. E. B. Freyer, gave him a surprise party at the Episcopal Residence, to which were invited the clergy of the Diocese and their wives. The Bishop received many personal gifts.

During the year 1929, Bishop Reese has observed the fiftieth anniversary of his priesthood and the twenty-first anniversary of his Episcopacy in addition to his seventy-fifth birthday.

LEXINGTON.

Rt. Rev. H. P. Almon Abbott, D. D., Bishop.

Conference at St. Paul's, Newport.

The Conference at St. Paul's Church, Newport, on October 8, 9 and 10, was voted unanimously to be the greatest conference, in attendance, worship and inspiration, to have been held in the Diocese of Lexington within the memory of the oldest inhabitant! The registration numbered one hundred and sixty, besides the residents of Newport, Covington, Fort Thomas and Bellevue-Dayton, and every session was "furnished with guests". The whole affair was a tremendous encouragement to our Bishop and he is deeply indebted to the rector and members of St. Paul's Church for their unbounded hospitality to all.

It is hoped to duplicate the experience at the summer school to be held at Margaret Hall, Versailles, in June.

During the sessions of the conference, the Standing Committee held a special meeting at which time the following resolution was passed and forwarded to Bishop Abbott:

"It is the unanimous opinion of the members of the Standing Committee that I write you, expressing the confidence of the Standing Committee in your leadership; congratulating you on the splendid work already done in manning the field; and assuring you of our sympathy and loyal support in dealing with the many problems you are called upon to meet.

Praying that you may be strengthened by God's Holy Spirit to continue your work, and to lead the Church in the Diocese of Lexington, to a brighter, happier day of greater service; and with warm personal regard from each member of the Standing Committee, I am

Cordially and respectfully yours,
(Signed)
James D. Gibson,
President of the Standing Committee."

Personal Notes

The Rev. S. E. Keeler, rector of St. Paul's Church, Akron, Ohio, on November 15, will assume the rectorship of St. Chrysostom's Church, Chicago, Illnois, succeeding Dr. Almon Abbott, who was consecrated Bishop of Lexington in May.

The Rev. Milo H. Gates, rector of the Chapel of the Intercession, New York City, has been nominated by Bishop Manning to be the Dean of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine to succeed Dean Robbins, who resigned last spring.

The Very Rev. Charles S. Hutchinson, D. D., Dean of All Saints' Cathedral, Milwaukee, has accepted the rectorship of the Church of St. John the Evangelist, Newport, Rhode Island.

The Rt. Rev. Beverley Dandridge Tucker, D. D., Bishop of Southern Virginia, is in the hospital in Norfolk, with three broken ribs, the result of a fall on October 30. It is reported that his condition is satisfactory.

The Rev. Benjamin M. Washburn, D. D., rector of St. Paul's, Kansas City, Missouri, has accepted his election as rector of Emmanuel Church, Boston, succeeding the Rev. Elwood Worcester, D. D., who recently resigned after serving the parish for many years.

The Rt. Rev. Paul Jones, D. D., some time Bishop of Utah, and lately secretary of the Fellowship of Reconciliation, in New York, will spend the fall and winter in the Diocese of Southern Ohio, acting for the Rt. Rev. Theodore M. Reese, D. D., Bishop Coadjutor, whose health has required that he have a leave of absence from episcopal duties for the time being.

The Rev. Herbert Pressey, formerly rector of St. Stephen's Church, Baker, Oregon, has accepted the rectorship of St. Mark's Church, Augusta, Maine, the change having become effective October 13.

The Rev. Herbert A. Wilson, Special Missionary in the Diocese of Michigan, who has had charge of St. Andrew's, Flint, for the past ten months, has been placed in charge of the work in Howell and Brighton.

The Rev. Walter B. Williamson, of St. George's, Detroit, Michigan, succeeds Mr. Wilson at St. Andrew's, Flint, Michigan. He will also have charge of Grace Church, Lapeer, and St. John's, Otter Lake.

The Rev. A. R. Eldon Garrett is now minister-in-charge of St. Hilda's, River Rouge, and St. Michael's, Lincoln Park, Michigan.

The Rev. William D. Davis has succeeded Archdeacon Hagger as rector of St. Jude's Parish, Fenton, Michigan.

The Rev. George Backhurst, formerly minister-in-charge of St. Paul's Mission, St. Clair, Michigan, has been appointed as Superintendent of the Detroit City Mission, at Mariners' Church. The change became effective on September 1, when the Rev. H. J. Pearson, after a summer spent in England, assumed the rectorship of the Church of the Messiah, Detroit. The Rev. George W. Ridgway will continue as assistant minister at the Church of the Messiah.

The Rev. R. M. Blachford has resigned as missionary-in-charge of St. John's, Otter Lake, and Trinity Church, Caro, Michigan.

The Rev. H. R. Williams has resigned as rector of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Lexington, and Christ Church, Croswell, Michigan.

"BEING BORN AGAIN...BY THE WORD OF GOD"

1 Peter 1:23.

Each package of Scripture sent out by the Scripture Gift Mission is made possible by the gifts of those who love Christ and His Word.

From the parable of the Sower and the Seed (Luke 8:4-15), we learn from Christ Himself that "the seed is the word of God", but that this message does not always bear fruit. Satan even "taketh away" some of it, and temptations and love of the world prevent it from bearing fruit.

Therefore we earnestly desire that each Distributor shall prayerfully seek the Lord's help in "sowing the Seed", and shall continue to water it with prayer so that it will "bring forth fruit"—that many others may come to know Jesus Christ as their personal Saviour.

A RECESSIONAL.

Kadesh Barnea.

"They could not enter in, because of unbelief."—Hebrews 3-9.

They came to Kadesh Barnea,
The Cloud had led them there,
And from the barren, rugged hills,
They saw a vision fair.

"Go forward! Canaan's pleasant land Unfolds before thine eyes."
They heard; but fear and unbelief
Did rob them of the prize.

Once more the Church of God has come
Unto this self-same place;
Once more she sees the crucial hour
And meets it face to face.

Once more she hears the Voice of God
Who speaks to guide and bless;
O! will she faithless turn again
And seek the wilderness?

No! she has learned her lesson well;
And "While 'tis called to-day"—
She leaves the wilderness behind
And seeks the upward way.

Once more the vision she had lost
Has come to her again;
And by Thy mercy Lord of Hosts
It shall not be in vain.

O Israel! there are tasks to do
And victories to win,
But God will bless thee all the way
If thou wilt enter in.

Partitions.

The Sabbath school is fortunate indeed that has room enough to allow classes to be separated in such a way that they will not interfere with each other. Teachers who are capable of keeping their classes quiet and interested, know how distracting it is to have a class nearby that is not quiet, or which is disorderly, because of its size, or the weakness of the teacher. Whole Sabbath-schools have been distracted by such classes. This situation is no longer necessary.

Ingenious minds have devised means of making a large room into smaller rooms in almost a "twinkling of an eye". This permits a school to have its opening and closing exercises in unison, but still provides for separation of classes that does away with distraction between them. It is remarkable how little space these "magic walls" take when not in use and how reasonably priced they are.

These same movable partitions are used extensively as a means of separating the church proper and the Sabbath-school room or other parts of the church so that they can be thrown open for overflow crowds at church services or evangelistic meetings. They have also been found ideal for small mid-week meetings and have proven an economy, since only the smaller room need be lighted and heated. Churches that do not have this means of separating their church and Sabbath-school rooms should study the matter carefully and get full information about it.

Church Equipment Service is the meeting place of church and Sabbath-school executives with producers of the things that will help them most. Write to the advertisers using these columns, for they can serve you well. If you have a need that is not fully met by these concerns, information concerning the needs of church or Sabbath-school will be cheerfully supplied if requests are addressed to Church Equipment Service, The Southern Churchman, Richmond, Va.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

He who would walk in safety must walk uprightly.

There is no such thing as an accidental saint.

"A good man loves goodness in the abstract, for its own sake; in others as well as in himself, in God transcendantly."

"God sent His Singers upon earth
With songs of sadness and of mirth,
That they might touch the hearts of men
And bring them back to heaven again."
—Longfellow.

The day is coming when nations will flee from armament as from a plague. For history shows that when a nation takes to arms and flaunts its power, it is inevitably sounding its own doom. —Dr. Geo. O. A. Buttrick.

"Light obeyed increased light:
Light rejected bringeth night."

There is nothing that a human being can gain that can be of any value to him unless it strengthens his spirit; neither is there anything he can ever lose that can in any way injure him unless it weakens his spirit.—Epictetus.

No man can live wisely, deeply, truly, until he has got out of the notion that he is his own property. Herein is the great mystery of the Christian faith.—Joseph Parker.

Let us be content to work,
To do the things we can, and not presume
To fret because it's little.—Browning.

Teach me to live! No idler let me be,
But in Thy service heart and hand employ,
Prepared to do Thy bidding cheerfully:
Be this my highest and my holiest joy!

He who loses wealth loses much; he who loses a friend loses much; but he who loses courage loses all. Hold on to your courage.—Appleton.

Behind the chaos of good and bad just about us, behind the seeming defeat of the right, behind disaster and loss and doubt, there stands up to our sight the figure of infinite love controlling all things. Beyond the imperfections of life lies the fulness of heaven!

He is not what he ought to be who with no increase of insight or earnestness, prays the same prayer, or offers the same praise twice. The need recurs, but in the meantime the soul ought to have learnt more of what it is for such as it, to ask of such a God.—Phillips Brooks.

"BIBLE BELT"

At last a modern philosopher and intellectual genius, exploring and describing these United States, has discovered that a section of the country known as the South and a State of it known as Virginia really exist. Count Herman Keyserling is the remarkable discoverer and, through an elaborate article in The Atlantic Monthly, tells his conclusion that this nation's real hope, real life and promise of continuing progress and power are in the South.

Observers, guided by common sense and acquaintance with facts, see nothing more exasperating or ridiculous than the shallowness and superficiality of the much-trumpeted claimants of intellectual and artistic superiority. Foreigners come, see New York, glimpse Washington, perhaps Boston, possibly Chicago and San Francisco, are seized as valuable social lions and advertisements and entertained in some pretentious houses and depart, triumphant, convinced that they have studied, seen and thoroughly understand the people, character, characteristics and prospects of all territory between the two oceans and Canada and Mexico. Perhaps we retaliate by sending forth our own philosophers who return to us, after some weeks or months in London or Paris, exuberantly persuaded that they know all there is to be known of Great Britain and the British, of France and the French.

Count Keyserling improves on his philosophical predecessors from abroad. He actually found and visited land and population South of the Potomac and they seem to have been a revelation to him. Results of his contacts are interesting, based on fallacies and absurd ignorance of truth, and yet partly true. Briefly, he finds the people of the South, especially those of Virginia, will be the guiding, governing, uplifting, saving power of the republic, because, he says, the Southern gentleman and gentlewoman "are the only types of complete souls the United States has yet produced." Like most of his kind, he fails to indicate what he means by "souls". Probably he was unwilling, or unable, to comprehend that the South has had, yet has and will have power disproportionate to its material wealth and voting strength, because by tradition, instinct and custom it has been, is and will be the "Bible Belt"—so named derisively by one of the smallest and most impotently vicious of journalistic sewer rats, a person, let us all be glad to know, of immediate foreign extraction. The South has stability and the majestic might of character founded on Christianity, directing its thoughts and sentiment and society. The count, in his attempted analysis of causes on which he bases prediction fails to dig deep enough. As usual with the constitutional materialist, he scratches feebly at the surface and refuses to penetrate to the fundamentals and actualities.

The Cavalier stock, of which so many Southern people come, sense of superiority surviving from former leadership, comparative poverty and absence of greed and intense industrial activity are recited by the count as explanations of what he calls soul supremacy and consequent general dominance and preservative influence in the South.

DeTocqueville, French gentleman and statesman, immeasurably an abler man than the count, lived in this country in 1831 and 1832 and wrote two large volumes on "Democracy in America", after faithful and intensive study, for the enlightenment of his countrymen. He gave many chapters to religion and its place in the life and future of our government. Himself a Roman Catholic, he dwelt at length on the repugnance of public sentiment to mixing religion and politics and on the wise abstention of the clergy, of all sects and denominations, from participation in politics —conditions of the past apparently curiously revived and illustrated by recent occurences in Virginia.

DeTocqueville wrote:

> "Despotism may govern without faith, but liberty cannot. Religion is much more necessary in the republic than in the monarchy. How can it be possible that society shall escape destruction if the moral tie be not strengthened as the political tie is relaxed? And what can be done with a people which is its own master, if it be not submissive to the Deity?"

He quotes New Englanders giving lavishly to send missionaries to the newly peopled States of the West, because "It is our interest that the new States be religious to maintain our liberties" and adds:

> "Such are the opinions of the Americans, and if any hold that the religious spirit I admire is the very thing most amiss in America and the only element wanting to the freedom and happiness of the human race is to believe in some blind cosmogony, I can only reply that they never have seen a religious or a free nation."

Perhaps the allegiance of the "Bible Belt" to the fundamentals of Christianity may be partly inheritance through the Cavalier strain, as Count Keyserling thinks. That blood has gone far and is evidenced in many remote places and lowly homes. Despite silk stockings, love locks, womanish looking lace ruffles at ankles and wrists and frequent follies and profligacies, the Cavalier was a good deal of a man. His underlying beliefs were very distinct and downright. His soul asserted itself in deathless devotion to church and king, enduring reverence for them while both were in the dust and cheerful readiness to yield for them life and blood and land. To some of us he is a more attractive figure than the smug, orderly modernist, believing in nothing, but protecting carefully his own skin and wage. Sir Walter Scott gives in one swift paragraph the humor and pathos of one of the worst of the Cavalier type, poor Roger Wildrake, swearing, drunken, reckless, who fought desperate duel with a man he challenged for "taking the wall" of a clergyman, pushing him from the narrow footpath into the mud of the street, and thereby insulting the Church. Yeomen who followed the Cavalier in staking all for a fallan cause, came with him to these strange shores and stood with him in maintaining the "Old Dominion", the one of Britain's wide possessions that Cromwell could not conquer, transmitted, maybe, the same instinct of fidelity and faith and courage born of the soul and without soul impossible. The Cavalier strain gave us Washington and Marshall, the most potent human forces in the establishment of the Union, and Lee, greatest power of all, among us here, for formation of character and as inspiration for emulation. But the best we get from the Cavalier and the Anglo-Saxon strain is the loyalty to religion they bequeathed us. The count ignores that. He may not know that the South has come through fires, refining much gold, purging away much dross. Early ease and opulence and pride of race and station tempted to indolence and decadence. Then came defeat and destruction, desolation and threat of extinction. Through the vicissitudes hearts have been bent in humble supplication for deliverance from the perils of prosperity and adversity and surely fixed where alone true joy is to be found. As a special favor of kindly Providence, for which to be deeply grateful, we have escaped the servile superstition of European superiority which has crowded the faculty lists of Northern and Western colleges and universities with foreign names and foreigners, and, also, the inflow of Atheists, Nihilists, Anarchists, Socialists and Communists, which afflicts and endangers the North and West.

From several converging causes the South has continued staunchly and sturdily the "Bible Belt", holding fast to the old faith of the fathers and founders, ruled by religion. That is the real power we have. DeTocqueville was right when he said, ninety-eight years ago, that power would rule and save the country . It is strange coincidence that the Frenchman, writing in 1832, and the German, in 1929, viewing the changing and changed country, form opposite standpoints and reasoning from differing premises, reached practically the same conclusion. The Frenchman of 1832 believed religion would preserve government and nation. The German, in 1929, believes the section in which religion is most prevalent and adherence to it most loyal and constant will rule and preserve us all.

There is no need nor excuse for sectional, prejudices, animosities or jealousies. All of us can unite in admiration for Puritan principles and achievement, for the vast work in building the country and winning glory for it done by the New England strain everywhere. All of us can and should hope very earnestly for the speedy and complete Americanization of all who come to us from overseas. We of the South have no justification for arrogance. We have been guilty of many sins, follies, neglects, and have much yet to learn from our brethren elsewhere and can find in them much that we may imitate. Conceding frankly the merits, virtues and services of others, let us pray very devoutly that we of the Southern States may escape the foul infections that invade even some churches beyond the Potomac and continue to be the "Bible Belt", citadel of pure, fundamental Gospel Christianity, and that all skeptics, doubters, higher critics and heretics of all varieties arising among us may continue to go from us to more congenial atmosphere and surroundings. Whether our section shall be dominant in politics, industries, wealth, is for the future. We of the present can do our respective parts to keep alive and active and powerful the teachings, meanings, faith, blessings and purifying, ennobling, principles of our Holy Religion.

Alfred B. Williams.

PRESIDING BISHOP.

The Right Reverend Charles Anderson, D. D., Bishop of Chicago, was elected our Presiding Bishop to fill the unexpired term of the late Bishop Murray at the meeting of the House of Bishops in Washington, D. C., on November 13. At the same meeting the Reverend S. Harrington Littell, of Hankow, China, was elected to succeed the late Bishop LaMothe.

Bishop Anderson will be remembered by many as delivering the inspiring sermon at the great opening services of the General Convention in Washington in 1928.

BISHOP ATKINSON OF NORTH CAROLINA, AT THE GENERAL CONVENTION OF 1865.

Captain S. A. Ashe, of Raleigh, North Carolina, author of the standard history of that State, is kind enough to send corrcetion of the story of the General Convention of the Church of 1865, recently published, along with some connected facts regarding Bishop Atkinson.

The circumstances of the return of the Southern bishops to the Church organization of the United States as given by Captain Ashe are not told in the contemporary newspaper accounts and probably do not appear in the official minutes, doubtless were obtained by Captain Ashe from Bishop Atkinson personally, and, of course, are absolutely authentic. Following is an extract from Ashe's History of North Carolina:

"The various religious denominations, having severed their relations with those of the North, remained in that condition; but the Episcopal Church had somewhat of a territorial character, and on the passing away of the Confederate States the question arose as to what should be done about 'The Protestant Episcopal Church in the Confederate States'. Some of the Diocesan Councils were held in May, 1865, but nothing was determined by them. The General Council was to meet in November, while the Triennial Convention of the Church in the United States was to meet in October. The Presiding Bishop on July 12 urged the bishops of the Southern States to attend. The meeting was to be at Philadelphia where 'Beauty and Booty' had been placarded as the incentive for enlistment, where Phillips Brooks had preached his violent sermons, and where, on May 6, the Episcopal Recorder had demanded that some of the leading bishops and clergy in the South should be hanged, a sentiment that found expression likewise in other Church papers. The invitation of Bishop Hopkins, however, appealed to brotherly love, and Bishop Atkinson deemed it his duty to propose reunion; and the State Council elected delegates to Philadelphia as well as to Augusta.

"Bishop Atkinson attended at Philadelphia, October, 1865, but when urged to put on his robes and appear with the Northern bishops, he declined, but took his seat in the body of the Church, but, later, he was prevailed on to take his seat as a bishop, along with Bishop Lay, of Arkansas; and the 'Gloria in Excelsis' was sung. There was a resolution for a joint service of thanksgiving on the restoration of peace. It contained an emphatic sentence touching the re-establishment of the authority of the United States, and was adopted by the House of Bishops. During the discussion Bishops Atkinson and Lay had absented themselves. When the House next met it became known that these Southern bishops would not join in that service. The resolution was at once reconsidered, and Bishop Atkinson was appealed to. He said: 'We are thankful for the restoration of peace, but we are not thankful for the re-establishing of the authority of the national government over all the land. We acquiesce in that result. But we cannot say we are thankful. We labored and prayed for a very different termination. I am willing to say I am thankful for the restoration of peace to the country and unity of the Church.'

"At once the resolutions were modified, merely to 'a day of thanksgiving and prayer to Almighty God for the return of peace and the unity of the Church.' While Bishop Atkinson's action did not at first meet with the approval of all that communion in the State, he was so revered and beloved and the purity of his motives and purposes were so evident, that eventually all bowed in submission; and so it came about that the Episcopal Church of the South passed away, the Southern Dioceses returning to the Church of the United States."

Captain Ashe adds this comment for The Southern Churchman:

"It is to be remarked that it was Bishop Atkinson who, by proposing that the State Church Convention should send delegates to the Triennial Convention, led the way—took the first step towards the reunion of the Church in the United States. His personal conduct had ever been in such accord with his ecclesiastical duty—his bearing and action all through life had ever been so reasonable, tender, wise and in conformity with his sacred calling—that there was blended in the regard and esteem of the people both reverence and affection. Indeed, but few men could have ever been so highly regarded in life. The following incident may be of interest:

" 'Wherever the army halted,' says Sherman's aide in his Story of the Great March, 'almost every inch of the ground in the vicinity of the dwellings was poked by ramrods, pierced with sabers, or upturned by spades. It was comical to see a group of red-bearded veterans punching the unoffending earth. Nothing escaped the observation of these sharp-witted soldiers.' Sometimes it may have been comical, but at others it was tragical.

"The venerable Bishop of North Carolina, in some respects one of the foremost men of that period, Thomas Atkinson, being at his home at Wadesboro, on March 3, when the Federals entered the town, sat down quietly at his books in his library, having asked the others of his family to remain in a room in the rear of the building. A soldier having knocked at the door, he opened it. 'He at once, with many oaths, demanded my watch, which I refused to give him. He then drew a pistol and presented it at me, and threatened to shoot me immediately if I did not surrender it. I still refused, and the altercation becoming loud, my wife heard it, ran into the room, and earnestly besought me to give it up, which I then did. He then proceeded to rifle our trunks and drawers, took some of my clothing from these, and my wife's jewelry.' 'In some instances,' adds Bishop Atkinson, 'defenseless men were killed for plunder.' "

A LETTER TO FRIENDS FROM THE HANKOW LITTELLS

September—1929.

AFTER an absence from China of over two years, it is indeed good to be back again at our home in the mission. In this locality, everything is fairly quiet at present, but several days before reaching China we realized the unsettled atmosphere of the country. A day out from Hongkong on our way up the coast, we learned that about one hundred and fifty suspicious characters had boarded the steamer, and as we were then in the very center of the pirate-infested waters of China, were relieved to hear that a strict guard was being kept over these passengers, who were travelling fourth class and who may well have been members of the gang who board steamers and at a given signal over-power the officers, and then are joined by a fleet of sailing vessels bearing other pirates from the shore. The men on our steamer were placed under armed guard day and night, and iron gratings were erected between them and the rest of us on the ship. With such precautions, nothing out of the ordinary happened, and we reached Shanghai at the end of June as planned.

Cheering News

On our arrival we were cheered by good news of the condition of the Church work in the Diocese of Shanghai. The temporary interference with educational and medical work which, in some places still continues, has not stopped direct evangelistic work, and Bishop Graves told us that baptisms in his diocese during the past twelve months have been larger in number than in any other year of the mission's history. For two successive years the number of confirmations has also exceeded all previous records. The same encouragement is recorded from the great Bible societies, both the British and Foreign, and the American, which report larger circulation of Scriptures, or of portions of Scripture, in the past year than in any previous year.

St. John's University was just completing a year's work of unusually quiet, steady progress, with a satisfactory attitude on the part of the students which has never been surpassed. Thirty-two men were receiving their bachelor's degree, while sixteen degrees in medicine and eight in theology, were being conferred.

St. Mary's Hall had also finished a remarkable year, and already school fees were pouring in from a rush of girls who hoped to be admitted next term by paying so far in advance.

Only one school in the Diocese in Shanghai has registered under the Chinese Government—that is, the boys schools of the Church of Our Saviour, which is an entirely self-supporting parish and school. And, this is the only institution which has been seized by the political factions of local Chinese. The building has been smashed up. For three weeks it looked as if the entire church property would be confiscated; and there is no prospect at present of reopening the school. Registration was apparently taken as a pretext for political interference with the internal working of the school, and this experience has not increased confidence that tying up our institutions to the Government is a wise move in this time of change and uncertainty.

China Is Not in a Rut.

For things are certainly seething in China, and are a long way from settling down into a peaceable and quiet Government. There is nothing especially obscure or inexplicable in the shiftings and counter-shiftings of the present political groups and of the military leaders of the country, unless one imputes to the Chinese traditions, beliefs, organization, economic system and experiences which they do not possess. The backgrounds of ideas and habits which are essential to effective civil Government and loyal co-operative effort, exist only in a rudimentary state in the China of today. At any rate, things are not in a rut, and there is movement and life and activity, wise and otherwise, throughout the length and breadth of the land. "Nationalism" is almost a religion, and is being bolstered up in many ways, in the same manner that a religious cult might be propagated; and, although it has so far shown itself impotent to overcome the old devious habits of oriental politics, it is a very genuine force in the country. It may fail again and again in its promises, but its strength does not diminish, and the future must lie with it. For in its broadest terms, Nationalism is neither a faction, a general, nor a government; it is merely the impact of modern thought upon China, and the force of that impact is well-nigh irresistible.

Experiences on the Yangtze.

The steamer trip up the Yangtze is always a delight, and we enjoyed the four days of the picturesque trip up the "Great River". As we passed Nanking, the new capital, we saw part of the new boulevard which runs for miles from the banks of the Yangtze direct to the tomb of Sun Yat Sen, which was dedicated late this spring.

At Kiukiang we disembarked for Kuling. On leaving the steamer we experienced the first of many illegal demands upon us by irresponsible officials, who in many places have already laid aside the terms of the tariff-schedule recently drawn up by China with other nations. In place of the likin-tax, which is merely local exactions in addition to legal custom duties, demanded by officials at will, which China promised to abolish, they have substituted at Kiukiang, a "Consumption Tax"—which is the same thing under another name. Two men, looking at my boxes, stated an arbitrary amount that must be paid on each, before I could take the things ashore, without knowing or asking what the boxes contained. When I asked to see the schedule of charges, they said there was none in print, but that they knew what was the proper tax to collect! I asked to see the receipt which they issue for payments, and they replied that none is given. When I finally agreed to pay whatever they charged, provided they would give me an official receipt, duly signed and stamped, which I would then send to Nanking with a full statement of the case, they changed their attitude completely, and under cover of the fact that I had paid full customs duties on my goods already at Shanghai, they declared that, of course, any further tax was illegal, and that they would not think of pressing for additional payments! As a matter of fact, at Shanghai, I had been required to pay the full Luxury Tax on such necessary foods as cereals and coffee, the Customs having decided that everything in our supplies was a "luxury".

Kuling and the American School.

I took Mrs. Littell and the children up the hills to Kuling, and we were delighted to find the place so little injured by the military and communistic disturbances of the past three years. Our bungalow was entirely untouched, and we found things exactly as we left them. The place is very beautiful, with three years' added growth to the trees and bushes.

The American School building also has been preserved from harm, and, as you may have heard, will be used again as the pupils re-assemble this month for the school term. Mr. Stone, the headmaster, has returned with his family, and is taking up with great vigor and interest the work which he has built up into such an admirable institution. Our children, Morris and Nancy, will be at the Kuling school this winter.

While I was at Kuling the Provincial Government made an attempt practically to steal the management of the Kuling Estate, by simply claiming without the slightest legal right, the control of the property. This involved the lots and houses of persons from fifteen or sixteen nationalities, and was such a flagrant breach of all the promises which the Nationalist Government has made in regard to protecting the rights of foreigners in China, that the matter was taken directly to the attention not only of the Nanking Government, but also to some of the Western Governments. Wide publicity was given to this attempted confiscation of property rights, which have been secure and unquestioned under recognized international law for the thirty-four years since Kuling was first purchased. The effect of the publicity at Nanking and elsewhere, at a time when the Government is claiming that it can protect foreign life and property without continuing Extra-territoriality, was most marked and immediate, and for the time being, the matter has been dropped.

Bishop Roots, and Three More Chinese Bishops.

Leaving the family at Kuling, I came on to Hankow alone. I found the Bishop well, and highly enthused over a trip to the Diocese of West China, where he and Bishop Norris of Peking had been to take part in the consecration of two Chinese Bishops. Speaking of his journey in the mountains and on the rivers of Szechuen Province, he said:

"I have never anywhere traveled through more beautiful country. In the smaller towns and villages, carefully tilled farms occupying all available ground, the teeming population, sparsity of schools, absence of modern sanitation, prevalence of preventable diseases, draining of vigorous youth into the armies, fear of banditry, penetration of a few political slogans, and the introduction of new ideas through laying out and partial building of new roads by military dictators—these are typical of China today. Yet the evident and deeply felt unity of Szechuen as distinct from and yet a part of the Nation, has as yet found only partial expression in either provincial unity of administration or coordination with the central government at Nanking.

"Every aspect of the people's life is undergoing profound changes and it is hard to say whether political or educational or economic or social or religious interest are most deeply stirred.

"The inherited religious instincts of the people are far from dead, though to judge from the sights at temples and local shrines, and chance conversation by the way, as well as what the missionaries report, there is an open-mindedness and readiness to hear something new which opens wide doors for preaching. And everywhere the Christian Mission and the Chinese Church are recognized as having come to stay and as worthy of respect."

You have probably heard also of the consecration at Hankow of the Rev. Lindel Tsen as Assistant Bishop of Honan. That was in February of this year; and now in the Chung Hua Sheng Kung Hui (our native Chinese Church) we have five Chinese Bishops (as many as the Church had altogether when I first came to China). The addition of these three Chinese brings the total number of our bishops in this country up to seventeen.

I find that our Hankow Religious Tract Society has the same report of growth and development as the mission and tract societies of Shanghai. The circulation of Christian books and tracts during 1928 increased by nearly 2,000,000; the total circulation being over 7,000,000 issues. And that in time of widespread unrest and famine!

Famine.

As you know, famine has raged over large parts of China for two years or more. Recent abundant rains are making possible crops in some of the western districts, but still there are wide regions where the people are close to starvation. It is not merely drought or inundation which causes famine in China, but civil warfare, banditry and increasing growth of opium. From one province cannibalism has been reported; and newspapers tell how the people there caught forty bandits and devoured them. A Chinese remarked when he heard this:

"Good idea! This is the most practicable solution of the Chinese bandit problem that I have heard!"

Personal.

I found our possessions in the Hankow house in remarkably good condition, considering that the house was occupied by Chinese soldiers after we left. Later it became a convent used by the good sisters of St. Anne, who were driven out of Shasi by wild hordes of soldiers in 1927 and who have not returned to their station since. The house is tumbling down in places, but is being repaired, and will continue to be "home" to us for a time. While little Joe, aged five, is the only one of the children who will be in Hankow this year, Edward is just across the river at Wuchang, on the teaching staff of Boone School, and is able to visit us frequently. John our eldest son, and his bride are in the American Legation at Peking, where he has the rank of vice-consul. Charlotte is a Junior at Vassar, where she is making the most of her college course and having gloriously good times, incidentally. Harrington is at Kent School, in the competent hands of Father Sill. (I think now that all the members of the Hankow Littell family have been accounted for!)

Changes.

Of course, we notice many changes in the Church work of this diocese after such a long absence. I miss not only many of the American members of the mission in this center, for our staff is dangerously low in numbers now, but also some of our best Chinese, like the Rev. T. T. Yang, a country clergyman of unusual evangelistic fervor, who died while I was away; and the Rev. T. K. Hu, one of the most remarkable preachers, who has retired because of ill health. These are severe losses to the evangelistic side of the work, which is not the strongest part by any means at present.

While our problems are many in the Church, there will be no letting down of effort nor failure to seize the opportunities before us. The Christian Church is a great and dependable steadying influence amid the cross-currents of vast and vital changes going on, changes which the Chinese people have had so little experience to help them face and direct. But there is no doubt of the fact that we find decided improvement over the conditions which we left two years ago; and we look forward to a continuous, though necessarily slow, development all along the line, which will make ultimately for a stable and progressive national life, so peaceably ordered by God's good governance, that His Church may joyfully serve Him in all godly quietness. Meantime we are thankful and glad to be back, and to have part in the work of building up God's Kingdom in China; and we send this letter of greeting and of warm regard to our many friends who uphold us in affection and prayer.

On behalf of the whole family, I am,

Faithfully yours,

S. Harrington Littell.

BIBLE QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

(Our readers are invited to send in their questions from time to time concerning Scriptural subjects in which they are perplexed or desire light. Our limited space necessitates brevity in questions, as well as in the answers which we will endeavor to maintain in strict accord with the Word of the Lord, which, after all, settles all argument. This column is therefore not for controversy, but for a testimony.)

Question No. 5.—From a Biblical standpoint through what age are we now passing, and where can I obtain light as to each other age?—G. R. G.

Answer.—We are now living in the sixth or Church age, also known as the age of grace. God's word treats of several ages as covering the course of this present world. Each previous age ended in human failure and Divine judgment. The Scofield Bible will readily aid you in your study of dispensational truth. There are also many Scriptural pamphlets on the subject.

Question No. 6.—Will The Southern Churchman kindly enlighten me as to why our Saviour, the Lord Jesus, has so many different names. I find at least twenty-five?—F. M. S.

Answer.—Your question is specially important. Search carefully and you will find more than one hundred different names, the reason being that no one name could express His greatness, His wisdom, His power and His glory. Each name, therefore, aids in revealing His different attributes, and various relationships to His own blood-bought followers. In Christ is hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge (Col. 2:3), "and His name shall be called Wonderful". It is a fascinating study to list these names and catch the ever-increasing view of the greatness of our Lord, in proportion to our increasing knowledge of each of His many titles.

In Christ is hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge (Col. 2:3) and how appropriate, then, that among His wonderful titles we find that "His name shall be called "Wonderful"—Mighty Counselor, King of Glory!"

WE BELIEVE THAT THOU SHALT COME

By Kenneth Mackenzie

XIX.

WITH the enemy incarcerated (Rev. 20:1, 2); with the King administering the government of the world, we are now able to comprehend in more particular details His benign office. The restoration of the earth, including the restoration of the land which gave Him birth, intimates to its lawful home. We are assured that He will gather together His dispersed from the four corners of the earth (Isa. 11:10-12); He shall lead "the seed of the house of Israel from all countries whither I had driven them; and they shall dwell in their own land" (Jer. 23:7, 8). He will remove the reproach of His people and give them "praise and fame in every land of their shame" (Zeph. 3:14-20). The very elements will participate in the glorious process (Isa. 49:12, 13). The comfort of His people which has been the theme for song and gladness, will now be made real (Isa. 40:1, 2; 54:4, 5). He will bring back to them the years of destruction (Joel 2:5); He will give "beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness" (Isa. 60:20; 61:3). Having been found in the land where they are now congregating with zeal and zest, their purification will have been effected, as we noted previously by His pouring out upon them "the spirit of grace and supplication as they look upon Him who was pierced and they shall mourn because of Calvary's tragedy" (Zech. 12:10). He will come to them with the balm of consolation when their sin is repented of; and His great heart will respond to their plea for mercy. Hence, Jerusalem shall be the joy of the whole earth (Ps. 48:1-8), and

The Restoration of the Nation

and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem (Isa. 2:3). We pause for a moment to note that Isaiah does not prophesy of the Christian Church, as is so popularly imagined. His distinct qualification is "The vision of Isaiah, the son of Amoz, which he saw concerning Judah and Jerusalem" (Isa. 1:1; 2:1). By no process of exegesis can we arrogate these wonderful promises and predictions to the Church and leave the nation of Israel destitute of its glowing hope. Christians who do this are spiritual despoilers; Jews who decline to accept the vision are blind to their true wealth. We cannot be too insistent as to this. Certainly, we may put into a Christian hymn, "Rise, Crowned with light Imperial Salem rise", but that does not, cannot abrogate God's pledged intention to restore His people to their land and its rights. The glorious sixtieth of Isaiah from which the thought was taken still rings out the eternal purpose, "Rise, shine; for thy light is come; and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee." For the Scripture cannot be broken (John 10:35). Therefore. we behold in this millennial age,

A Forgiven and Restored People, who shall enter into the fulfilment of the promise given to Abraham. He did not inherit the land (Heb. 11:12) as we know, nor his descendants after him. Barring the realm of Solomon, and that not altogether unmixed with hostility (1 Kings 11:25), interfering nations were constantly breaking into the peace of God's people, until the final deportation when King Zedekiah lost the crown, which has never been restored. Nor will it until "He comes, whose right it is" (Ezek. 21:27). We review His heart-burning declaration as He wept over Jerusalem, "Ye shall not see me till ye say 'Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord'" (Matt. 23:37-39). And now that He shall have taken the crown and brought the nation to Himself, forgiven the sin of Calvary in the recognition of the sorrow that marked their revelation of it. He will fulfil to them all the gracious promises upon which the fathers of all ages have doted with longing and prayer. How alluring the prediction, "They shall dwell in their own land" (Jer. 23:8). And now they shall, with the land extended far beyond the present limits (Ezek. 47:13-21; Deut. 11:24). That was an audacious claim of Moses (Deut. 32:8), "When the Most High divided to the nations their inheritance, when he separated the sons of Adam, he set the bounds of the peoples, According to the Number of the Children of Israel".

Such a phenomenon has never been known. But it will be; and the surrounding nations will gladly make room for the people of the land (Isa. 49:18-23). We must concede that such a prospect, far distant in perspective, and in Isaiah's day far removed from any possible fulfilment, must have been by inspiration of Him who has challenged us in the memorable declaration, "My counsel shall stand" (Isa. 46:10). Unless one brings the mind to a close study of the prophetical sections of the Word of God in a reverent desire to know and follow God's plan, a wide comprehension of the divine intention is not possible. Few can take the time; few care; and more do not believe in it at all. Our present province is but to suggest headlands of expectancy and trust thereby to win the reader to seek more light as he is able. But surely, we must see from these alluring passages that a marvellous future lies beyond us in this poor, sin-cursed earth, with which our Lord is to benevolently deal in "that day". And how we may warm our hearts towards the people of His choosing as we discern in the prophetical outline the purpose to exalt them who have been as the off-scourings of the nations. Patient, unresisting, trustful, they have bided their time and now it shall have come. How significant the words, "The sons of them that afflicted thee shall come bending unto thee; and all that they despised thee shall bow themselves down at the soles of thy feet" (Isa. 60:14)! The wildest dreams of man could not portray a so-compensating picture. But God planned it; and in many places in His Word has pledged His purpose (Jer. 31:35-37; 33:19-26 as illustrative).

The Missionary Achievements of Israel.

during this age are not to be lightly estimated. There may be some division of opinion as to what that mission will be. But we may at least hazard the guess that it will be a world-wide evangelism in every way reversing the tragic verdict of the night before the crucifixion. Then, they said, "Away with him" (Luke 23:18); "Let him be crucified" (Matt. 27:22, 23); "Not this man, but Barabbas" (John 18:40). In the new age, they will joyously cry, "Lo, this is our God; we have waited for him" (Isa. 25:9). And they will enthusiastically spread the news to the inhabitants of the earth. We can little appreciate the thrill with which they will burst into praise and worship before our Lord and Saviour, who as the Son of David is truly theirs according to the flesh, even as He is ours according to the power of the Spirit of God. And evidently, the original Twelve (excluding Judas of course) will now enter upon the fulfilment of the singular promise which flowed from the interrogation of Peter (Matt. 19:27, 28). They shall sit upon thrones, Judging the Twelve Tribes of Israel.

As they were witnesses to the rejection, they will now direct the acceptance. The uniqueness of their position has no parallel. Israelitish by blood, children of God by the new-birth, they will combine the two relationships in a special ministry. The depths of their joy in this will transcend anything that can come to those who were not with Him in the horrors of the Garden and the Cross. And though they "all forsook him and fled", they were in some degree included in His sufferings; so that the exaltation is commensurately appreciable. And probably they will be joined by many of the race, who came under the power of the "new man" in Christ. For the special ministry of the nation will be to prove the Messiahship of our Lord Jesus and the everlasting truth of "the Word of God which liveth and abideth forever" (Isa. 40:8; 1 Peter 1:22-25).

Those of us who are regally related to Him will have our part in "the restoration of all things" as we have already noted. But it will be more in the line of winning men to the spiritual side of our Lord's royalty. Having been translated into the kingdom of the Son of His love (Col. 1:13), the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ will have His place for us. Our possession of bodies capable of astral as well as terrestrial life, there may be many missions according to the royal purpose in which we shall be engaged. The prospect is hidden from us and only reverent contemplation may picture the possibilities of that age of wonders. The vision of Isaiah which discerns a "highway"

(Isa. 35:8) of a supernatural character may be the medium through which our two-fold ministry shall be met.

So we close this period of our study with the heart-warming assurance that God has not forgotten His ancient people (Isa. 49:13-17); that He will not fail to fulfil His promise to Abraham (Gen. 12:1-3); that the tragedy of Calvary, acknowledged and repented of will bring joy to the nation which demanded His crucifixion (John 12:32); that in a way unprecedented, the people of the land will become the custodians of the truth and the administrators of His benefaction to the whole wide world; and that Jerusalem will possibly become the capital of the earth.

WESTMINSTER THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY

Additional Details of the Story Related by Dr. Frank H. Stevenson.

DR. STEVENSON told of the depression that followed the decision of the St. Paul Assembly. Hundreds of supporters of the doctrinal position of Princeton Seminary had felt that the light had gone out of the sky. Some of them had spent themselves utterly in the vain effort to warn the Presbyterian Church of the disaster that attached to the popular catch-words: "An inclusive seminary for the church."

He spoke of the happiness of associating with the Philadelphia business men who had proceeded in a business-like way to a constructive work and had not been disturbed for a moment by adverse criticism. He said the friends of the new institution were multiplying and that he could not conceive of a decreasing interest and was sure that from this time Westminster Seminary was certain of a large place in the hearts of Bible-loving Christians all over the world. The difficult thing was to make a beginning, and this had been accomplished.

The first plans called for not more than thirty students, not more than six professors, and a budget not to exceed fifty thousand dollars annually. The latest report shows forty-three students committed to the school; a well-rounded faculty of brilliant scholarship and teaching ability; $31,000 in cash on hand for the first year's expenses; pledges made in Philadelphia on July 18 for $22,000 more; a building adequate for present purposes conveniently located in Philadelphia given rent free and tax free; and a peace and joy among the sponsors of the movement that is ample compensation for all labor done.

That the seminary needs more money, more friends, a permanent site, and adequate endowment, is, of course, apparent. Every additional student is expensive, and unforeseen requirements occasion fresh outlays of money. The demands for the current years are considerably in excess of anticipations. The offerings of every adherent of the institution will be necessary, and much more, if the first year is completed without debt. But letters from the Finance Committee are going out to Presbyterians asking help; and help will come. It is a notable fact that the $31,000 in cash contributions have come without solicitation and largely from givers living at a distance from Philadelphia.

According to Pennsylvania law, no educational institution in the state can grant degrees until the possession of $500,000 in productive income is proved, aside from grounds and buildings in use by the school. This is a goal Westminster must reach. Degree granting powers are not immediately essential, for students who are planning to preach find degrees of slight value, and to them a certificate showing the completion of the prescribed course of study, signed by the faculty and bearing the authorization of the seminary, is a sufficient credential. Until recently, Princeton Seminary gave such certificates to graduates. But some students will be preparing to teach in colleges and theological seminaries, and to them degrees are of consequence. The stability of Westminster will hardly be assured until its endowment meets the requirements of the wise provision of the law of Pennsylvania and a reserve fund of at least $500,000 should be subscribed and set aside for dependable income. Churches and individuals will enjoy contributing to such an object. They will be giving to a cause beside which all other causes seem transient and small.

Question: Is Westminster Seminary to be controlled by the General Assembly?

Reply: It is not. Westminster will be controlled by individuals who are Presbyterians, for the purpose of teaching the Reformed Faith as set forth in the Westminster Standards. It will continue to do this regardless of the decreasing interest of church courts in sound doctrine. Its student enrollment is predominantly Presbyterian, and most of its graduates will occupy Presbyterian pulpits. It is expected that students from other Evangelical churches will take advantage of the instruction offered by the eminent professors on the faculty of Westminster. They will be welcomed heartily.

Dr. Stevenson thought a permanent organization for the seminary could be attained within a few months, and that the members of the board and corporation would be satisfactory to the conservative constituency in the church. The temporary officers had consecrated themselves to the work at hand and would do their best pending more formal arrangements.

He added that too much credit was not likely to be given: (1) To Dr. Schall and the group of Philadelphia elders for initiating the project and giving time from their busy affairs to seeing it through; (2) To Drs. Wilson, Machen and Allis for devoting their entire vacation to the seminary, speaking and writing constantly, securing the right teachers, preparing the curriculum, and putting their experience at the disposal of the executive committee; (3) to Mr. Morgan Thomas, treasurer of the seminary, for the loan of a fine office in the Garrett-Buchanan Company, and the use of his office staff during the summer; (4) to Mr. Paul Woolley, who has toiled day and night with the immense number of details involved in preparing for the comfort of students, carrying on a vast correspondence, and executing orders of the committee with good judgment and speed; (5) to Mr. Edgar Frutchey, for developing plans of finance; (6) to Mr. F. M. Paist for his work as chairman and for his rare ability to direct the enterprise steadily ahead; (7) to The Sunday School Times and other evangelical papers for stalwart editorial support; and finally (8) to the known and unknown friends of the Old Book and the Old Faith who have freely given their money and their prayers to Westminster; and to those who are preparing to help in days to come.

Dr. Stevenson closed by recounting messages of encouragement from ministers: David D. Burrell, H. H. McQuilkin, Maitland Alexander, L. B. Crane, F. N. McMillin, A. Gordon MacLennan, and F. Paul McConkey. None of these had been able to attend the early meetings, but all were in thorough accord with measures taken.

Professor Robert Dick Wilson's Ambition for the Seminary.

Dr. Wilson declared that the new seminary in Philadelphia, if it were to attain its purpose, must be saved from the fate of being "just another seminary". The Christian Church had too many seminaries of this sort now. Westminster must take rank with the best schools in Scotland and Germany. It must be respected by powerful schools of theology like Union Theological Seminary and the theological departments of the University of Chicago and Harvard. Professors at Westminster must be equal to the task of answering the most learned men in the world of scholarship when they attack the Bible. He said he never could be what they call in Britain "a little Englander", one who thought provincially and could not think in terms of the continents of the empire. Unless Westminster attained an international reputation, it would fail. He thought the new seminary had teachers to attract students from across the seas, and leaving himself out of account, he said something of his colleagues, of their equipment and accomplishments. He was glad they were young men of vigor and ambition. He predicted that students would come from Japan and China, from India and Persia, from South Africa and Holland, from Scotland and North Ireland. Dr. Wilson was sure American Christians would sustain the institution to the last dollar required for its prosperity.

Dr. Machen said the steps taken toward a new seminary had not been taken lightly or hastily, but with all due deliberation and with earnest prayers for the blessing of Almighty God.

He called attention to the condition of churches of the Reformed Faith in Europe, and said in many countries there is almost nothing left of the once mighty Evangelical Church. The friends of the Gospel waited too long before acting. In Holland is a notable exception. The Church there, under the leadership of wise men like Kuyper and Bavinck, has kept in large part uncompromisingly loyal to the truth, and amid widespread blight, Holland is showing a vigorous Christian life worthy of the best traditions of her sturdy and great past. He thought it altogether unnecessary to consent to a drift in American Christianity which will lead to inevitable ruin.

ECKENER'S DEBT TO MAURY.

When Graf Zeppelin flies to America again, and Dr. Eckener makes his promised visit to Richmond, he should be escorted out to the Maury monument, and there he should place a wreath. For it was Maury, as this paper has more than once reminded its readers, who fixed Dr. Eckener's route for him long before the German engineer was born. Maury established the important fact that the prevailing winds are from east to west in mid-Atlantic, via the Azores, and he made that the general route of travel for all sailing vessels. The North Atlantic never carried any heavy east-to-west tonnage until the era of steam. In the next era, unless vastly more powerful engines are devised, the airship will return to the track of the vanished clippers.

What patience Maury had in working out his Sailing Directions! From the naval observatory in Washington, he sent out appeals to every sea captain whose name he could get. All of them were asked to make daily observations of the wind, the current and the weather, to record these in special logs, and to send these books to Maury. He and his assistants spent years in going over each of these, in fixing on the map the point of every observation, and in marking there the direction of the wind at the time the reporting ship had passed. It soon became necessary to plot curious circles between every meridian, so that the mariner might note the change of the wind at the different seasons. In the course of three or four years, most of the blank spaces on the charts were covered, and the sheet became a mass of figured circles, bewildering to the layman, but so full of meaning to the sailor that he was often able to save weeks on a voyage.

Yes, the monument to Maury is a monument to patience! —Editorial in Richmond News Leader.

PRAYER OFFERED BY COMMODORE M. F. MAURY.

For thirty-four years every night Commodore Matthew Fontaine Maury offered the following prayer, which he dictated with almost his dying breath as a legacy to his children.

"Lord Jesus, Thou Son of God and Redeemer of the world, have mercy upon me. Pardon my offenses and teach me the error of my ways; give me a new heart and a right mind. Teach me and all mine to do Thy will, and in all things to keep Thy law. Teach me to ask those things necessary to eternal life. Lord, pardon me for all my sins, for Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory, forever and ever. Amen."

A TWENTY-FIFTH BIRTHDAY.

By Elizabeth Cole.

We do not consider a person very old on his twenty-fifth birthday. On the contrary, he is supposed to be just starting out in life—his childhood, adolescence and youth have now passed and he is about to reap the advantages of those habit-forming and character training years. At twenty-five he has reached man's estate with a future before him.

In considering the twenty-fifth birthday of one of our oldest organized health movements, however, we are inclined to feel that a decade has been a long period of time. The National Tuberculosis Association, which was founded in 1904 and this year celebrates its twenty-fifth birthday, has crowded these years so full of accomplishment that we are inclined, and rightly, too, to regard it as a grandfather among organizations.

When the National Tuberculosis Association was formed, there was only one other non-official health agency of a national character in the entire United States, the American Public Health Association, which was organized in 1872. It had no operating program, however, and its energies were devoted largely to the publication of a magazine and the conduct of an annual meeting. Thus the National Tuberculosis Association became the first organized health promotion agency of a non-official character in the country, with a nationwide scope and program, and has served as a model for many of the other specialized public health movements.

Laymen as well as physicians were included in its membership from the beginning, and its purpose to help the country, both economically as well as socially in combatting the scourge of tuberculosis has been manifested in many more ways than in the chief outwardly-seen one, namely, the greatly reduced death-rate.

For twenty-five years the National Tuberculosis Association has been a leader in organized education of the public in the ways of health. By emphasizing the need for rest, fresh air, food, cleanliness, sanitary living and working places, freedom from fatigue in various occupations, as well as the need of suitable institutions for incipient and advanced cases of tuberculosis, this association has made its greatest contribution. It has made the public health-conscious.

In looking back over the twenty-five years these are some of the actual results they have helped to bring about. In 1904 there were 115 sanatoria in the United States with an aggregate bed capacity of 9,107. On January 1, 1929, there were 618 tuberculosis hospitals and sanatoria with a combined capacity of 73,695 beds. There were no tuberculosis dispensaries or clinics in 1904. In 1928 there were 3,671. The first open-air school was established in Providence, Rhode Island, in 1908, and now there are at least 1,000 schools for children from tuberculosis homes or who are sub-standard in health. There were not more than ten public health nurses who devoted a definite part of their time to tuberculosis work twenty-five years ago. Now there are 7,115. There are eighty-three preventoria for children. In 1904 there were in existence twenty tuberculosis associations, of which number only eight had money or active programs. Now there is a state association in every state and there are local associations in the larger cities and counties numbering 1,454.

The Association was founded for the study as well as for the prevention of tuberculosis and research work has been carried on from the beginning. In 1920 a formal Committee on Medical Research was organized and the influence of its coordinated studies and discoveries has already been marked.

These are briefly a few of the visible accomplishments of this twenty-five year old movement. In supporting its work through buying Christmas seals the funds of which are used to carry on the campaign it is well to remember that twenty-five years is a comparatively short time and that there is much more to be done. There are still over 500,000 living cases of tuberculosis in this country and in 1928 there were 93,000 deaths. There are far too many patients being admitted to sanatoria in the late instead of early stages of the disease. Although we can rejoice that the death-rate has been cut in half, yet in the age period, fifteen to forty-five tuberculosis still takes more lives than any other disease. Here is the prime productive group of our nation, with one out of every five deaths occurring then caused by tuberculosis!

There can be no feeling of self-satisfied complacency on this twenty-fifth birthday. Rather should there be a renewed ambition to go forward. Armed with maturer experience, it will be the aim to reach that goal when tuberculosis shall be reduced to a comparative minimum.

THE EFECTIVE CHRISTIAN COLLEGES: By Dr. Laird T. Hites. Cloth. Pp. 259. Published by The Macmillan Company, New York City. Price, $2.

Here is an unusual plea for the training of Christian men, who shall be so gripped with the reality of their faith that they shall by the contagion of their own enthusiasm spread abroad the glories of their calling. Far too long has the matter of evangelism been relegated to the clergy or professional preachers who have the gift. The present-day trend towards personal evangelism is a good sign which Dr. Hites would welcome. And his contention is that, instead of a man's losing his religion by going to college, he should find it there, if he has none when he enters, or discover it to be a growing power if he goes there with a definite religious experience.

And we may sympathize with his assertion that most of Christian students enter college with but untutored concepts of religion. It has been handed to them by parents and others, who know as little of the reason why of Christianity as themselves. They have been poured into a mould and come out antagonistic to the larger world to which college life introduces them. Much of the wreckage which we deplore through college influences is the result of this "naive religious heritage", as Dr. Hites calls it. There is no sensible ground for a young Christian losing his faith, unless he has very little to lose. The author cites one case who enthusiastically said, "Dean, this year has been the most wonderful in my life. I came here to learn; but I had no conception of the great things I should learn; and what I have discovered has strengthened my faith. I can see God everywhere." That young man may have been anything, denomination-wise; but he had something worth treasuring. And we are bound to say that much was due to the influence of judicious teachers, who were not bold and blatant to break down his faith, but to meet him on the ground of his appreciation of the great scientific truths which his college was to offer him; and to lead him onward to build upon solid foundations. Dr. Hites has no sympathy with the iconoclasm of some professors (whom we know) for their notorious anti-Christian attitude.

EDUCATION AND RELIGION: By President Charles F. Thwing of the Western Reserve University. Cloth. Pp. 264, with Index. Published by The Macmillan Company, New York City. Price, $2.

Dr. Thwing has the same note of encouragement for the education of our young men and women in truly religious thinking and doing by means of the education which the college provides. When he says, "My present interpretation is that the knowledge of God should be made a part of the course of study of the college and the university", he quotes the memorable sermons and teachings of the elder Dwight of Yale; President Carter of Williams and that widely loved man, Mark Hopkins, of whom a student when asked to define a university, declared, "With me at one end of a log and Mark Hopkins at the other."

The author's counsel to the student in his formative period and as well in the lengthening years of post-graduate life, particularly the legal and medical men, through whom every class of men will find a fitting classification, is a wise and fatherly solicitous appeal to the highest of which his readers may be capable. Dr. Thwing may well so dispose of the problem at hand; for his long years of experience in the exalted office he filled as president must have mellowed his heart and softened the severely technical angles of his administrative years. He protests against the tendency to make the aim of education the getting of a living, rather than the living of a life. Certainly, a man with such a concept of the object of education cannot fail to impress his readers with the lofty ideals of his own mind and heart.

FAVORITE SCRIPTURE VERSE.

(In this space each week will appear a favorite passage of Scripture as sent in by a different reader. Every one is, therefore, invited to send us their favorite verse. It is suggested all who can, join with the rest of us in committing to memory the verse which appears here each week, including its location in the Holy Book; and in due time your memory chest will be laden with choice, eternal treasures, indeed. "Thy word have I hid in my heart, that I might not sin against thee," Ps. 119:11.)

This week the following verse was submitted by

Mrs. L. D. Campbell, of Bunkie, Louisiana:

> "God, who hath commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ."—2 Corinthians 4:6.

Who will send one from the far-away places as well as very near us?

MASS AND THE LAW OF THE CHURCH.

Mr. Editor:

The following appears in the "Christ Church Reminder", the weekly bulletin of Christ Church, Chattanooga, Tenn., under date of October 27, 1929:

> "The helpful thing about the priest making the ablutions immediately after the Communion is that it enables us to make our thanksgiving at once. After long experience I find that thanksgiving is often forgotten. One should never fail to make earnest thanksgiving as soon after Communion as possible. At the High Mass, or one at which you have not communicated, this time during the ablutions should be used for fervent intercessions, acts of self-dedication and love, confession, resolutions and promises to God of greater efforts to pure living and loving Him."

The quotation is here interrupted to observe that inquiry has so often been made by the writer in these columns, without reply, for the authority of any Clergyman in the Protestant Episcopal Church to celebrate "Mass" (High, Low, Requiem, or any other kind), or for the authority of any Bishop to permit any such celebration in his diocese, that the necessary inference is that, for the most part, the law of the Church, expressly and specifically repudiating and condemning the Mass, is regarded as a dead letter.

Of course, individual thanksgiving after the Holy Communion meets with instant approval, but it is highly instructive to note the character of thanksgiving the communicants of Christ Church, Chattanooga, are advised to offer:

> "The following is a simple thanksgiving, with minor changes, compiled by one of our Holy Priests, and I am sure he would not object if we, finding it helpful, use it:
> " 'Hail Mary: St. Joachim: St. Ann: St. Joseph: St. John: St. Francis: St. Athanasius: Pray for us: St. Augustine: John Keble: Edward Pusey: Pray for us: James deKoven: Father Field; Mary Gabriel: Pray for us: All ye Holy Angels and Saints; All ye Holy Innocents; Pray for us'."

It may be interesting to some of your readers to be reminded that the Rev. Edward Pusey, one of the "Saints" whose prayers are thus invoked, was an English Clergyman who, in the early part of the last century, actively participated in the organization of the "Anglo-Catholic", or "Back to Rome" movement, which was imported to America and is now engaged in an earnest effort to disrupt the Protestant Episcopal Church.

What is the law of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America on the subject of the Mass and Invocation of Saints?

The answer is found in the Articles of Religion, which the last General Convention overwhelmingly refused to scrap.

> "Article XXXI. Of the one Oblation of Christ finished upon the Cross.
> The offering of Christ once made is that perfect redemption, propitiation and satisfaction for all the sins of the whole world, both original and actual; and there is none other satisfaction for sin, but that alone. Wherefore, the sacrifices of Masses, in the which it was commonly said that the priest did offer Christ for the quick and the dead, to have remission of pain or guilt, were blasphemous fables and dangerous deceits."

Could the Church have spoken in plainer language?

What is the law of the Church concerning Invocation of Saints, such as St. Pusey et al? Article XXII tells us:

> "The Romish doctrines concerning Purgatory, Pardons, Worshipping and Adoration, as well as of images as of relics, and also Invocation of Saints, is a fond thing, vainly invented, and grounded upon no warranty of Scripture, but rather repugnant to the Word of God."

Such is the law of this Church, to which every Bishop and Clergyman, at ordination, solemnly swore conformity.

But what do such trifling things as the doctrinal laws of the Church and oaths of conformity amount to, anyway? Why not take steps at the next General Convention to boldly and frankly do away with them?

C. L. Marsilliot.

Memphis, Tenn.

ARE YOU HELPING TO DO IT?

"Voltaire is reported to have once said that to kill the Christian religion, they (the atheists) must first kill the Christian Sabbath. Whoever then does not keep the Sabbath day holy, according to the noted skeptic, is helping to destroy the Christian religion."

ALWAYS ROOM FOR ONE MORE.

"I'd join the church if it wasn't so full of hypocrites," said a man, who stood very high in his own opinion, to a clergyman, who replied: "My dear fellow, don't let that stop you. We can always find room for one more!"—C. E. N.

Church Intelligence

Winona Lake School of Theology.

The 1929 session of Winona Lake School of Theology, was the best in its history. A satisfactory increase in the student body was registered, and both faculty and students were enthusiastic in their work.

Eighteen denominations were included in the student body. Eighteen states and Canada were represented. This school is rapidly coming to be known as "America's Summer Seminary."

The faculty was "all star" made up, as usual, from outstanding professors who are recognized as authorities in their particular fields, and known to be evangelically orthodox in their faith. They are Dr. Melvin Grove Kyle, Dr. John E. Kuizenga, Dr. Leander S. Keyser, Dr. George L. Robinson, Dr. Robert H. Glover, and the Dean, Dr. J. A. Huffman.

The officers of Winona Lake School of Theology are: Dr. W. E. Biederwolf, Director; Mr. C. E. Sawtelle, President; Dr. J. A. Huffman, Dean.

A high percentage of the student body was made up of teachers from Theological Schools, Colleges, Bible Schools, Mission Schools and Pastors.

Elaborate plans are being made for next summer's session. Already an unusual amount of interest is manifested. The dates will be: First Semester, July 9-July 26; Second Semester, July 28-August 14.

The first class of Winona Lake School of Theology, composed of seven men and one woman, will be graduated next summer. Six of these will receive the Master of Arts (in Theology) degree, while two of them will receive the Bachelor of Theology degree. The graduates will represent almost as many states as the number in the class and several of the denominations. Winona Lake School of Theology is interdenominational.

A Prospectus of the 1930 session will be ready about the first of the year, and copies will be mailed to those requesting. Requests for copies of the Prospectus will be carefully filed, and filled as soon as they are ready.

An Emergency—NOW.

Hitherto, when the undersigned has written of Easter School, Baguio, it has been at the special request of the editor of the Diocesan Chronicle, or of the principal of the school. This is a purely voluntary contribution; an act of supererogation, with no request about it. Certain things ought to have been said long ago, but each succeeding principal of Easter School—there have been five in the last five years—has been too modest to say them, lest she seem to be self-seeking. The time has come, I believe, when they must be said and when something must be done about them.

The house used for residence of the principal at Easter School is a disgrace to a Christian mission.

Sixteen members of the Altar Guild went into the house one morning to clean it, and prepare a welcome for Mrs. Wilner and her family. Here are a few of the remarks made at that time: "How do we get this green stuff off the walls?" "What shall I do about this cupboard? If we wash it all the paint falls off." "None of the windows will close." "We cannot dry these things, because if the fire is built forward, it fills the house with soot." "Those girls are cleaning the ceiling and it is all falling down." "It is impossible to clean the windows or they will fall out." "None of these things will go through the doors"—and since the Wilners have arrived, they have found it impossible to move the necessary furniture from room to room.

I did not see the house through Mrs. Wilner's eyes, when she arrived with a family of four in the midst of a typhoon and found a puddle of water in every room, but I did get a little insight into her spirit when I heard her very Christian remark, "Well, it is fine to know where all the leaks are right away, so that we may avoid them." It may be fine to know where the leaks are, but there is no avoiding them, as she has since found out. Mr. Wilner came across a story the other day of a family in the southern mountains that lived in such a ramshackle house that every time it rained the inmates had to go out and sit in the sedan. His comment was, "Our situation is the same, except that we have no sedan."

The Wilners have come to Easter School prepared to "play the game" with heart and soul, and with a courage that few would have, knowing the circumstances beforehand. An emergency changed all their plans and gave them four days instead of four weeks to pack up their goods and take the helm at Easter School. They are the kind of missionaries who can meet emergencies. We want them kept fit to do the big piece of work they have undertaken with such high courage. We hope that some one who reads this may meet the emergency at Easter School by providing—not next year but now—a decent dwelling place for the Wilners.

This is an emergency now.

"I think this house is all worn out," said one of the little Wilners, as a slice of house came out at his touch. May some one come to the rescue, before the residents are all worn out trying to live in it.—F. C. B., in The Diocesan Chronicle.

Well-Known Churchmen Receive Honorary Degrees.

The Episcopal Church was prominently represented at the Convocation of Columbia University held on October 31 to commemorate the one hundred and seventy-fifth anniversary of the foundation of the University. President Nicholas Murray Butler, of St. George's Church, New York, presided. Bishop Manning gave the benediction and Dr. Caleb Stetson, rector of old Trinity Church, offered the opening prayer. Mr. William Barclay Parsons, the Chairman of the Columbia Trustees, and a vestryman of Trinity Parish, made the oration.

Among those receiving honorary doctors' degrees were the following well-known Churchmen:

The Rev. Bernard Iddings Bell, Professor of Religion in the University and Warden of St. Stephen's College, Doctor of Letters.

Milton H. Turk, Dean of Hobart College (Columbia 1886), Doctor of Letters.

(It is interesting to note that Columbia and Hobart are two of the three colleges originally founded in New York State under the auspices of the Episcopal Church.)

The Rev. Roelif H. Brooks, rector of St. Thomas' Church, New York (Columbia, 1900), Doctor of Sacred Theology.

The Rev. Francis L. H. Pott, President of St. John's University, Shanghai (Columbia, 1883), Doctor of Sacred Theology.

Charles Sears Baldwin, Professor of Rhetoric, Warden of St. Ignatius' Church, New York (Columbia, 1888), Doctor of Letters.

John Erskine, Professor of English, novelist, superintendent of the Sunday School of St. Agnes' Chapel, New York (Columbia, 1900), Doctor of Letters.

The Rev. Elwood Worcester, rector of Emmanuel Church, Boston (Columbia, 1886), Doctor of Sacred Theology.

Frederick J. E. Woodbridge, Johnsonian Professor of Philosophy and Dean of the Graduate Schools, Doctor of Laws.

Birthday Thank Offering.

The Birthday Thank Offering is a voluntary offering given by the boys and girls of the Church to show thankfulness for all God has given us of friendship, love and joy. It started at the General Convention, held at Detroit, Michigan, in October, 1919. It is always for new work, never for salaries.

The first offering was made to the General Convention meeting at Portland, Oregon, in 1922. This was a gift of a boat, Pelican II., for Bishop Rowe.

The second offering was for a school in Liberia, the third for a new dormitory for Hooker School in Mexico City. This last offering, presented to the General Convention meeting in Washington, in October, 1928, was the largest, amounting to $34,153.56.

The next offering to be presented at General Convention meeting in Denver, Colorado, in 1931, is to be for the Children's Ward in St. Luke's Hospital, Tokyo, Japan.

A Qustion of Canon Law.

The daily press reports a controversy among our Church people in New York.

The New York Conference of the Christian Unity League is holding its sessions this week, November 13-15, in St. George's Episcopal Church, New York City, at the invitation of the rector, the Rev. Karl Reiland. Also at the invitation of Mr. Reiland, the Presbyterian minister, the Rev. Dr. Henry Sloane Coffin, President of Union Theological Seminary, is scheduled to be the celebrant on Friday of the Holy Communion at the altar of this Protestant Episcopal Church.

This is considered contrary to the canon law of the Church, which says that no man not episcopally ordained can officiate at a sacrament of the Episcopal Church in an edifice consecrated as an Episcopal house of worship.

The Rev. Guy E. Shipler, Editor of The New York Churchman, supporting Mr. Reiland, said: "This conference is not being held under the auspices of the Episcopal Church. It is held under the auspices of the Christian Unity League. Dr. Reiland is simply offering a bit of normal Christian hospitality to the Christianity Unity League."

The Rev. Dr. Caleb R. Stetson, rector of Trinity Church, backs the objectors. He said: "I have no objection to ministers of different denominations meeting together to discuss Christian Unity, but I think it is going rather far for a Protestant minister to be asked to celebrate the Holy Communion at one of our altars, because I do not believe a Protestant minister wishes to be considered an Anglican priest."

The Anglo-Catholics are prominent among those who believe that the law of the Church is being violated. They have been hoping that the officers of the Christian Unity League would substitute an Episcopal pastor for the Non-Conformist clergyman, in which event the Holy Communion could be held in St. George's and all the delegates, no matter of what Christian faith, could partake. The Anglo-Catholics have also suggested that this closing service should be moved to a neighboring denominational church, in which event Dr. Coffin could be the celebrant without breaking the canon law.

Bishop Manning, up to the time of this printing, had not yet taken any stand nor entered into the controversy.

Dr. Cameron Davis Elected Bishop Coadjutor of Western New York.

Dr. Cameron J. Davis, rector of Trinity Church, Buffalo, was elected Bishop Coadjutor of Western New York on the fourth ballot at the special convention of the diocese, held at St. Paul's Cathedral, Buffalo, on Tuesday, October 29.

It is expected that the Bishop Coadjutor-elect will become Bishop of Western New York in two years, when division of the diocese will be completed. Bishop David Lincoln Ferris has indicated his intention of resigning the Bishopric of Western New York in order to accept that of a new diocese with Rochester as its See City in 1931, when the General Convention is expected to approve the division. Under such circumstances, the Bishop Coadjutor automatically would succeed.

Dr. Davis was born in Watkins, N. Y., December 13, 1873. He was graduated from De Veaux School, Niagara Falls, N. Y., in 1891, and from Trinity College, Hartford, Conn., in 1894. He was ordained deacon in 1897 and priest in 1898, by Bishop Walker. He became curate of Trinity Church in 1897 and rector in 1901.

Dr. Helen S. Peabody.

Helen S. Peabody, for thirty-eight years principal of All Saints' School, Sioux Falls, South Dakota, died on All Saints' Day. Ever since her father, the Rev. A. B. Peabody, took his young bride out into the Dakota country in the pioneer ox-cart days, the Peabody family life has been woven through and through the fabric of the Church. Under Bishop Kemper's direction, Mr. Peabody became the only church missionary in a vast region. When Bishop Hare opened All Saints' School for white girls, in 1885, Miss Helen felt herself too young and inexperienced to shoulder the principalship alone, as he asked her to do, and associated her older sister, Sarah, with her for the first year. Any one who has access to the 1924 volume of The Spirit of Missions will be repaid by reading the charming article about those early days. Miss Helen, to whom the University of South Dakota later awarded an honorary degree of Doctor of Letters, continued as principal until 1921-22, when she was succeeded by a younger sister, Eunice, who has since become principal of the Cathedral School for Girls in Laramie, Wyoming. Another sister, Miss Mary, now in Sioux Falls, was Bishop Hare's secretary.

In the current annual report of the National Council, Bishop Burleson, having commented on the seeming widespread indifference in Church people to the whole cause of Christian education, adds:

"In contrast to the indifference manifested by the General Church, I feel it a privilege to record the splendid service of one family to the cause of Christian education. When last June Miss Eunice Peabody (fifth of the name resigned the position as principal which she had taken in succession to her elder sister, Dr. Helen Peabody, the women of this family had carried on the institution for forty-four years. Here is a contribution to Christian education which can scarcely be equalled and is nowhere excelled."

Gaining Ground!

Many thanks to you, diocesan and parochial treasurers, and to you, good people of the Church, for the fine support rendered to the missionary work of the Church during October.

During the month we made up $55,500 of the decrease from last year's receipts and are now "only" $82,242 behind 1928.

Only thirteen dioceses and districts are now in the one hundred per cent class, as compared with sixteen at this time last year. The districts of Honolulu, Liberia and Mexico, have paid their quotas for the entire year.

The practice of sending monthly statements to subscribers is steadily growing. It is necessary, because:

An unpaid pledge is a temptation.

1. To stay away from Church services.
2. To reduce next year's pledge.
3. To refuse to pledge for next year.
4. To give grudgingly instead of joyously.

Faithfully yours,
Lewis B. Franklin,
Treasurer.

Bishops Address Missionary Institute.

The Woman's Auxiliary of the Diocese of Washington held a Missionary Institute at Epiphany Church on Tuesday, November 12, beginning with a celebration of the Holy Communion at 10:30, with Bishop Freeman as the celebrant. Intercessions followed, and an address was delivered in both morning and afternoon sessions by Bishops Burleson and Campbell, respectively. These and other Bishops heard through the week have been in Washington attending the meeting of the House of Bishops on November 13 to elect a Presiding Bishop.

Foreign Lands Share in Cathedral Service.

The first Cathedral service broadcast to foreign lands from this country was that held on Armistice Day at 11 A. M. in Bethlehem Chapel of Washington Cathedral.

By special request of the Columbia Broadcasting System, the service as sung by the Washington Cathedral Choir, under the direction of Edgar Priest, and the sermon preached by the Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., was broadcast over the nationwide network of the Columbia System, and to foreign lands through Station W2XE in New York. This service was a service of prayer and thanksgiving for all those who served in the Great War. The entire service was very beautiful and impressive and was participated in by a large congregation.

At three o'clock of the same day, the annual service in commemoration of Woodrow Wilson was held in front of the War President's tomb in Bethlehem Chapel. The service was conducted by the Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., who was assisted by Dr. James H. Taylor, pastor of the Central Presbyterian Church, of which Woodrow Wilson was a devoted member. Bishop Freeman made a short address. The Cathedral Choir rendered the music of this service also and again later at the daily choral Evening service at four o'clock. Armistice Day was celebrated in a number of the churches throughout the diocese. At Grace Church, Georgetown, a flag pageant entitled "The Cross Triumphant", was presented. The service consisted of a special Litany in three parts, including "An Act of Remembrance", honoring those who made the great sacrifice in the World War; "An Act of Dedication", resolving to work unceasingly for the furtherance of peace, liberty and justice in the world, and "An Act of Thanksgiving and Prayer", giving praise for the steps already taken to end war.

The Rev. M. Mills Perkins, rector of the church, conducted the service and had charge of the presentation of the pageant.

At Christ Church, Georgetown, the day was marked by special selection of appropriate music, by sermon by the rector, and by playing of taps by a Boy Scout immediately after the benediction.

At Grace Church, Southwest, representatives from various patriotic organizations attended, and the military feature was carried out by the sounding of the call to colors and taps by a bugler from the Army War College. The rector, the Rev. Meade Bolton MacBryde, preached the sermon appropriate to the occasion from the text, "Lest We Forget the Things That Our Eyes Have Seen".

St. Andrew's Day Meeting.

For the St. Andrew's Day meeting of the Brotherhood in the Diocese of Pennsylvania, an unusually strong program has been prepared. The service and meeting will be held at the Church of the Epiphany in West Philadelphia, the former at five o'clock in the afternoon. Many months ago, Bishop Murray had accepted the committee's invitation to make an address at the afternoon service and taking his place, that great friend of the Brotherhood, Bishop Lloyd of New York, will be the visiting speaker.

At the large evening meeting the speakers will be the new Coadjutor of the Diocese, Bishop Taitt, Mr. H. Lawrence Choate, National President of the Brotherhood and Mr. A. D. Parker, active Layman of the Diocese, who was in missionary work in the West while prominently identified with one of the railroad systems.

The evening will close with an Hour of Preparation, conducted by the Rev. Dr. Tomkins, rector of the Church of the Holy Trinity and the rectors, wardens, vestry and Brotherhood of the Parish of the Epiphany are looking for a large and representative gathering.

The rector of the Epiphany Church, the Rev. William Newman Parker, who is a member of the Brotherhood's National Committee on Clergy Cooperation, will represent the diocese. The general theme of the meeting is taken from our Lord's reply to Pilate, "To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth."

Bishops Attend Meeting.

The Diocese of Pennsylvania is being represented this week at the Washington meeting of the House of Bishops by Bishop Garland and his recently consecrated Bishop Coadjutor, Dr. Taitt. It is Dr. Taitt's first opportunity to sit as a member of the House of Bishops.

The annual service of the Bishop White Prayer Book Society was held at the service Sunday evening in St. Paul's Memorial Church, Overbrook, at which the Rev. Joseph Fort Newton was the special preacher.

The semi-annual meeting of the Philadelphia Association of the Students of the Virginia Theological Seminary was held November 7, in the Bellevue Stratford. After luncheon the business meeting was held, at which the president, the Rev. Robert R. Windley presided, and the address was made by the Rev. Prof. George C. Foley, D. D., of the Philadelphia Divinity School on "The Historical Study of Doctrine".

Armistice Service at Christ Church.

An impressive Armistice Day ceremonial was held at Christ Church, Norfolk, at the 11 A. M. service November 10, the rector, the Very Rev. H. Dobson Peacock, officiating. There were special prayers and music appropriate to the occasion, the lessons were read by Admiral Guy H. Burrage, Commandant of the Fifth Naval District and, in place of the sermon, an address was delivered by Admiral Watt T. Cluverius, Commandant of the Norfolk Navy Yard. Referring to the national colors that stood with the cross in the church, Admiral Cluverius earnestly, reverently and eloquently urged that the Church should lead the Nation in maintaining peace in the world.

In the processional the national colors used always by the church, following the cross, were followed in turn by regimental flags of the nation and the state attended by an armed color guard of sailors. During the service arms were stacked at the chancel steps and the official colors arranged on either side of the altar. After the benediction and before the recessional, colors and arms were presented before the altar, while Chopin's funeral march was played on the organ, followed by the firing of three volleys by a firing squad without the church, the sounding of "taps" by a naval bugler and, finally, by the thrilling strains of the National Anthem on the organ.

Thirty-Ninth Anniversary.

The Venerable F. W. Neve, D. D., Archdeacon of the Blue Ridge, writes: "Only last Friday I took part in the thirty-ninth anniversary of the opening of the Church of St. John the Baptist in the Ragged Mountains, which was the first I ever built for the mountain people, and is, therefore, the grain of mustard seed out of which the Archdeaconry of the Blue Ridge has grown." The Archdeaconry has grown to cover an acre of 10,000 square miles, extending into seven counties, with forty-odd workers, twelve clergymen and about 1,100 communicants; twelve day schools and a preventorium for rebuilding undernourished children.

We recall The Order of the Thousandfold, an organization, which also was started by Archdeacon Neve. The daily prayer of its members is: "O God, make me a thousandfold more useful to Thee than ever before." It would seem that the prayer of this great and consecrated ambassador of Christ is being abundantly answered.

Let us "hold up his hands."

All this work requires large sums of money, even with the most careful management. There are other similar communities crying for the same attention, and the Archdeaconry of the Blue Ridge is eager to get to them. No greater opportunity for distinguished and valuable service could be opened to the members of the Episcopal Church than the support of this great enterprise.

Laymen's Dinner.

Three hundred men, representing fifty parishes and missions in Brooklyn, sat down to dinner with the Bishop of the diocese and the Bishop Suffragan recently at the Leverich Towers Hotel. This dinner is the first result of the Laymen's Conference at Easthampton in September, and is to be followed by two other similar dinners, one in Riverhead on the evening of Armistice Day, for the parishes of Suffolk County, and one a few days later in Hempstead for Queens and Nassau Counties.

At the dinner, Dr. Walter Truslow, chairman of the Brooklyn Lay Committee, presided. The speakers were Wm. F. Leggo, Diocesaan President of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew; Wm. S. Hubbard, M. D., who gave his impressions of the Easthampton Conference; J. D. Allen, Ph. D., Principal of the Polytechnic Country Day School, who spoke very effectively on the responsibilities of fathers; and our two bishops. Bishop Stires made a strong and inspiring appeal to the laymen for personal work for the church, calling them the non-commissioned officers of the Church's army. Their part is a very important one, calling for devotion and sincere purpose, and allowing ample scope for all a man's talents. Generals can not win battles alone; rectors without the help of their laymen can accomplish but little. Bishop Larned's speech provided practical suggestions as to the laymen's part. By means of a large map of a typical parish, he illustrated group organization, and showed how effective such organization could be in the development of parochial strength, and how fine an opportunity the plan offered the hearty cooperation of the laymen.

If the interest which was plainly developed in the three hundred men present can be translated into action, or, in Bishop Stires' words, if we can "change a talkie into a movie", there will certainly be great results in the Brooklyn parishes.

Beloved Clergyman Passes On.

The Rev. Julian Edward Ingle, ninety-one-year-old retired clergyman, and one of the most beloved and venerated priests of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of North Carolina, died at his home in Raleigh, at 6:30 o'clock the morning of November 4.

Funeral services were held at the Church of the Good Shepherd the day following.

Taking part in the services were Bishop Joseph Blount Cheshire, the Rev. Henry G. Lane, Dr. A. B. Hunter, Dr. Milton A. Barber, the Rev. W. W. Way and the Rev. E. H. Goold. As a special mark of respect to a departed priest the casket was placed in front of the altar within the chancel space.

The remains were left in the church for several hours after the services, and the body clad in full priestly vestments rested before the altar until carried to the station for removal to Washington.

Interment took place in the Congressional Cemetery in that city Wednesday morning, November 6.

The Rev. Julian Edward Ingle was born in Washington, D. C., August 25, 1838.

He came to North Carolina in 1879, accepting a call to Holy Innocents' Church, Henderson, where he remained in charge for thirty years, giving devoted service in a remarkably fruitful ministry.

The Diocese of North Carolina conferred many honors on this eminent priest, he having served as dean of the diocese for a number of years, and after the state was divided as dean of the Raleigh Convocation. He was also examining chaplain, secretary of the Diocese of North Carolina for over twenty-five years, and delegate to three Triennial General Conventions of the Church. He was also a trustee of St. Mary's School and St. Augustine's School.

At the time of his death he was senior clergyman of the diocese.

Although having no active parochial charge, in recent years, Mr. Ingle was often called upon for special offices at the Church of the Good Shepherd and at Christ Church, Raleigh, where he moved upon his retirement. His ministry at Henderson left an indelible impress on that community and few ministers have ever been so beloved in that city.

Those who were privileged to be near Mr. Ingle in his declining years will not readily forget his mental vigor and keen interest in the affairs of the church, nor will they fail to remember the depth of his humility, his penetrating sense of humor, the steadfastness of his faith, and his loyal devotion to the Church of his fathers.

Annual Clergy Conference.

Record-breaking attendance of Florida's clergy, both white and colored, marked the Annual Clergy Conference of the Diocese, held in Jacksonville, October 9 and 10. The conference opened with a Corporate Communion in the Church of the Good Shepherd, the Rev. Charles A. Ashby, rector, the Bishop of the diocese being the preacher and the celebrant of the occasion. During the business sessions of both morning and afternoon, the subjects of Evangelism, the Ministry of Laymen, the Negro Work, Christian Social Service, Religious Education and Diocesan Missions, were presented and discussed.

The evening session was devoted to a serious consideration of the work of the Department of Finance. Florida, as for the past three years, expects to pledge its full quota to the National Church, and will make every effort in its coming educational campaign and canvass to arouse its people to look upon this goal as their obligation and

THE CALL.

Jessie E. Williams.

I know now it had followed me
For many a heedless year,
But I was busy at my task,
Too busy far to hear.

And so I toiled with fishing boats,
Drew nets from out the sea,
Unmindful that far-off voice
Was calling, calling me.

How long it fell on my dull ears
No human tongue can say,
But—glory of the universe!
At last—this very day—

An hour ago—divinely clear
Above the roar of sea—
"Come thou and leave thy fishing nets!
Come thou and follow Me!"

"Prayer, That Unnatural Act."

Who ever said such a thing as that? It seems as if it might be just one more of the ever-ready sneers and doubts that await every high endeavor. It looks like something we could well ignore as the utterance of an atheist. But not at all. This exclamation came forth from one of the greatest exponents of prayer that our age has seen. It was the word of one who never ceased praying, who kept praying in the forefront all the time, who was forever devising new ways and finding out and telling his fellows how to do it better. It was the voice of one who has been described as "the last of the great Puritans", Alexander Whyte. Right in the midst of urging men always to pray and not to faint, suddenly there leaps out of his talk about it this classic word, "half carol and half cry", "Prayer, that unnatural act".

Few could go beyond Alexander Whyte in telling the glories and splendors of praying. No one ever searched out with slower or more painstaking quest any least triumph of the human soul in prayer. None could commend it with more warmth or strive with more loving zeal to get some cold and silent soul to "take with him words" and speak again to God. And then on the other hand no one could tell with more frankness all the difficulties that beset the soul when it tried to do it.

Perhaps it never occurs to many of us that difficulty is an incitement as well as a discouragement, and that in this age when everybody is trying to show how easy and natural everything is, and how it can all be done with the turning of one's hand, there is still a place for those who are frank to tell how difficult it all is. These, too, win their converts. Such words brace and warm as well as startle and offend.

A prayerful woman, all her life prayerful, consecrated and devoted and never far away from the work of the kingdom, once heard these words and instantly she was all aglow and said with relief, "Who said that?" It did her more good to hear of some one who knew how prayer went against the grain, who felt all the hindrances that clogged the way of prayer, who knew how, the minute one began to do it, a world of other considerations would rise up to make one delay it, than to hear the familiar vein of how easy it was. Here was a word which reckoned honestly with all that difficulty with which she was so familiar. And, where the general way would be to tell how feasible it was and how natural, in short to make it so natural that you could put it off forever, here was a word which took account of all the rigors and the disappointments and the setbacks and, mysteriously enough, made her believe in it and wish to pray more than ever. At this word she was willing again to let down the nets. Ashamed hitherto at all her reluctances in praying, full of chagrin over the dull methods that beset her and the languidness that would lie like a shadow across the track of devotion, mortified by the long gaps that would intervene between the times of prayer, and so tempted to think it was against our nature, here came a word from one of whom all the world knew that he was "a passionate pray-er", one who had power with God and man and had prevailed, confessing that he, too, had always felt all this. And she took up her prayer with new courage and new force.

While prayer is the crown and glory of our nature, there is much in us that is clean contrary to it. We like to think about ourselves, and it is only with difficulty that we emerge from doing this and get to be at home in the lives of others, and especially in the life of God. Frederic Myers, the poet, who in his poem, "St. Paul", caught as fully as any one ever did the pain and passion and patience of Paul's life in prayer, has told us something of what the trouble is with us. He said that in his early days he was absorbed, almost to the exclusion of other influences, in classic literature. And then he found the reason was that classic literature is an intensification of one's own self. And the Bible does not encourage us to dwell long on ourselves. Prayer is an act that goes against our nature for the same reason. Another poet spoke of "shaking off the nightmare of self-consciousness and self-absorption", and that is what we do when we pray. There is nothing we are so proud of, nothing so inseparable from us, as our favorite thoughts, and when we begin to pray they begin to be challenged. "Let the . . . unrighteous man (forsake) his thoughts." The object of prayer is not only to press petitions, but even more to partake of the divine nature, and at that our nature rebels. And so prayer is unnatural to our lower nature. But to those who face that fact, brave that severance from self, from custom, from pleasure, there come the warmth and exaltation, the poise and peace and power that make us know what the divine nature is, given to us in Christ.

"Public prayer, that unnatural act," Dr. Whyte went on to say. Our immemorial habit of assembly for prayer seems so instinctive, and yet there is in it something that calls for all that is in us, and something that fights against what is in us, too. Beneath the decorous surface of our congregations, how much goes on. The assembly is "a sea of glass mingled with fire." And for whoever leads the prayer what fears, what faintness, what inadequacy and unworthiness, what temptations to silence all rush into sight at once when he names the ineffable Name! So it never takes places as calmly as we suppose. We have to call upon our souls and all that is within us, we have to summon almost forcibly the laggard faculties, they will not come up without our call. Men do not gravitate toward prayer. The gravitation is all the other way. They do not drift into it, they only master it.

And more, the whole movement of life with its cry for speed, for results, for action, its brag about "people who do things", its warnings that we shall be left out if we do not accept its terms and its times, all this conspires to make prayer seem an unnatural act. It goes against our nature in our highly organized society to have to do anything alone, and to be long out of view. We are ambitious, feverishly so, that everything we do should count for the utmost, and tell, and be seen, and that we should get the credit for it. We can run out on the street and by saluting many people by the way let them know that we are here; we hate to be forgotten; but we are not so sure that that act of praying will have more effect, more influence than anything else we do. Yet "influence is the power that is distilled from a life that is lived in communion with God." There is much in our time, and in every time, to make us feel it is not safe to stop for this.

It seems to be almost of the very nature of the best and highest things that at first they seem unnatural. Beatitudes, promises, blessings, rewards, and warnings—some one is always on the spot to tell us they will never work. A long forgotten man said in the United States Senate years ago that the Ten Commandments were an irridescent dream. The world has forgotten his name; but James Russell Lowell remains part of our life by his cheerful conviction that "the Ten Commandments will not budge". Those strugglers and wrestlers of our race, who found in themselves nearly everything to make them feel it was not natural for such as they to pray and to prevail, seem at this distance to be the only ones who were normal. Do not be deceived by every shallow passer-by who is dogmatic about what is natural. Christ brushed swiftly past all the pompous knowledge that paraded itself always in the way of his bringing weak and sinful men to know what pardon and wholeness were, and he bade the feeble and the evil to perform that act so unnatural for them at the moment, asking and seeking of God who would be their Father in Heaven. We, too, must brush past these pompous dogmatisms of our own hearts, and listen only to our Lord Jesus Christ about what is natural.—Sunday School Times.

NOVEMBER GARDENS.

John S. Stephens.

In these November Gardens bare,
Once grew the rose, the lily fair,
And often on a summer's day
I revelled in their beauty gay.

But now a miracle is done,
Chill grew the winds and pale the sun,
And when I came again this morn
The lily and the rose were gone.

And in their place, I found instead,
But withered things, all dark and dead.
Without a vestige or a trace
Of their once loveliness and grace.

November Gardens bleak and drear,
There is a strange, sweet solace here,
Among thy drooped and dead bouquets,
Came memories of bygone days.

And though thy perfumed breath hath fled,
With all thy lovely flowers dead,
Thou hath the charm to wake in me,
Full many a golden memory.

A Historian's Reference to Christ.

Flavius Josephus, the well-known Jewish historian, lived almost contemporaneously with Christ—A. D. 37 to 96. In his famous volume, "The Antiquities of the Jews", is found the following interesting passage:

"Now, there was about this time Jesus, a wise man, if it be lawful to call him a man, for he was a doer of wonderful works—a teacher of such men as receive the truth with pleasure. He drew over to Him many of the Jews and many of the Gentiles. He was (the) Christ; and when Pilate, at the suggestion of the principal men among us, had condemned Him to the cross, those that loved Him at the first did not forsake Him, for He appeared to them alive again the third day, as the divine prophets had foretold these and ten thousand other wonderful things concerning Him; and the tribe of Christians, so named from Him, are not extinct at this day."—Selected.

THE STORM.

(And in the fourth watch of the night Jesus went unto them walking on the sea" (Matt. 14:25).

When Gennesaret was tossing,
The apostles in their crossing,
And the fury of the tempest stirred the deeps of Galilee;
The disciples' faith was crumbling,
At the shock of Nature's rumbling,
And their hearts forgot the Master who is Lord of land and sea.

When the hurricane was howling,
And the sky was dark and scowling,
And the little ship was sinking in the Sea of Galilee;
On the brink their hopes were trembling,
Fierce fears assailed, assembling,
And they lost their hope and vision in the Pilot of the sea.

When their final hopes were sinking,
And doubting gripped their thinking,
They consigned themselves to drowning in the Lake of Galilee;
When they'd given up the yearning
At the thought of home returning,
They saw a white-clad figure clamly walking on the sea.

Then Peter's voice came ringing,
From his confidence now singing;
"Master, bid me come, let me walk on Galilee".
Then the Master, sweetly smiling
At the storm and waves up-piling,
Called across to boasting Peter, "Come to me upon my sea".

Like a heavy anchor tumbling
From the deck through waters rumbling,
So swiftly was he sinking in the Sea of Galilee;
But his hands went quickly reaching,
To his Master, voice beseeching,
"Hurry, Master, save me, ere I sink beneath the sea".

Soon the Master's form was bending,
Heart and hands and hope extending,
And He lifted up the sinking from the deeps of Galilee;
And the eyes of Peter wondering,
Asked his Master why his blundering!
"If your faith was small and simple you could walk upon my sea".

When my ship of life is meeting
Darkest nights, where storms are beating,
Then my heart goes calling, singing to the Lord of Galilee;
Through the storm-cloud tempest's lining,
Breaks the Sun of Heaven, shining,
And my waters smile in calmness when He walks upon my sea.

A PILGRIMAGE AND A STRANGER.

Myrtle Humphreys.

In Two Parts—Part I.

Sandy was on the verandah gnawing a ham bone, and about him were ranged all the little Harders who watched him with great interest. I said all the little Harders, but strictly speaking, there were only six of them. The seventh and youngest had gone downtown with her mother.

Sandy held the bone between his paws, and put his head first on one side and then on the other as he gnawed ravenously. It was a large bone and well supplied with meat. One of the Harder twins had taken it from the pantry and given it to Sandy. Perhaps it was fortunate for the dog that Mrs. Harder chanced to be downtown.

There were entirely too many dogs in the town where Sandy was born. Few and evil had been his days. For nearly a year after birth, he had run wild with his little brothers and sisters. Their food consisted of stray odds and ends, and they received more than one undeserved kick. Only a few days before, Sandy had been caught as he was hurrying a flock of ducks. A freight train stood upon a nearby switch, and the furious owner of the ducks caught Sandy by the neck and flung him into an empty box car.

"You've bothered my stock enough," he said, as he slammed the door. A moment later, the train pulled out, and thus was Sandy exiled from the city of his birth. It was dark and lonely in the car, and many hours passed before any one appeared. Then the train stopped and a brakeman opened the door. He seemed surprised.

"What are you doing here?" he queried. "How'd you get in? Out with you." And once again Sandy was booted into the open.

Disconsolately, he wandered down the street. It was hard to be a pilgrim and a stranger. Then it was that he spied the little Harders. He reflected that children were nearly always more friendly than grown people. Wagging his tail, he came forward, and was promptly accorded a royal welcome. All the little Harders greeted him like a long lost brother. Sandy sat up and held his forepaws primly against his chest. It was the only trick he knew, and he could not even remember who had taught him; but his posture caused a shout of admiration. Then it was that Tom Harder ran into the house and returned swiftly with the ham bone.

When the repast was ended, they had a fine game of romps. The Harder girls left their paper dolls on the verandah and joined in the frolic. Ted, the other twin, harnessed Sandy to their cart, and set the dog to pulling them down the street; and it was just at this point that Mrs. Harder came in sight. She was wheeling the youngest Harder in her perambulator, and her appearance raised a storm of acclamation.

"Mother, see what we've found."

"He's half starved."

"You ought to see him sit up."

"Mayn't we keep him, mother?"

Mrs. Harder looked from one to the other. Perhaps it was not strange that her face often wore a harassed expression, for the eldest of her seven children was only eleven. She regarded Sandy with a resigned air; and he thumped his tail against the sidewalk in a deprecating manner while an anxious expression stole into his beautiful brown eyes. Mrs. Harder relented visibly.

"We must ask your father," she said finally; "but nothing can be decided until we see whether his owner will claim him. Come into the house, Tom, and grind the ham for me, while I make sandwiches for your lunch."

Tom was frankly embarrassed, but he faced the situation manfully. "There ain't no ham," he answered truthfully, if not grammatically. "I gave the bone to Sandy."

"And he did eat it all up," supplemented Arthur Augustine Harder. He was popularly known as "Bunny", which appellation he had bestowed upon himself, being entirely too young to pronounce his own baptismal name.

"You must not take things from the larder without asking permission, Tom," reproved Mr. Harder. "If you have given the ham to the dog, you must do without sandwiches for lunch, as there is nothing else. You must lunch upon bread and milk."

"But, mother, he was nearly starved," protested Tom; "and I'd rather do without the ham myself and let him have it"; and all the little Harders concurred in this opinion.

"Very well," responded their mother as she lifted the baby from the perambulator. "Put Sandy in the stable and then come immediately to lunch." Thereupon Sandy was escorted by an admiring retinue to the back of the house, where he was left in the abandoned stable for a period of temporary seclusion.

There was a school fete that afternoon and all the Harders, except the baby, were to attend. They were all dressed shortly after lunch, and Sandy barked dismally as he peeped through a knot-hole and saw them going down the street with their mother. A strange and disheartening stillness settled upon the premises. Sandy slept for a time and then awoke refreshed and ready for a frolic. After a time the baby also awoke from her nap; and the neighbor who was staying to care for her carried her to the front verandah, where she placed upon her the floor and gave her some playthings. Then, after trying the veandah gate to make sure it was securely fastened, she went in and shut the door.

Meanwhile Sandy was exploring the stables, seeking for a way to get out. After a time he discovered where a pane of glass had fallen from one of the old windows, and a moment later he was racing around the house.

The baby was not afraid of dogs. She crept to the edge of the verandah and peered through the bars of the little gate which had been erected for her protection. Sandy mounted the steps and kissed her through the bars. She giggled and rubbed her nose with her tiny fist.

Sandy was agile and the gate was low. He sprang over the barrier and romped about the enclosed space. The long linen protectors on the porch chairs first attracted his attention as they swayed in the breeze, and these were soon reduced to tatters by the dog's teeth. Then his frolicsome mood extended still further. The sofa pillows were shaken so vigorously that their filling came out and was scattered broadcast while the baby blinked and sucked her thumb. During the scuffle, the porch rug slipped through the gate and overhung the steps. Once again Sandy lept the gate, and, seizing one end of the rug in his mouth, he raced up and down the street with the rug trailing behind him and, raising a whirlwind of dust. The street sprinkler went by and reduced the dust-covered rug to a mass of mud, but Sandy was not disheartened. He dragged it back to the lawn and lay still gnawing and shaking it.

Everything has an end and even school fetes are no exception. Mrs. Harder came down the street with her brood trailing behind her, but she paused aghast at the sight by which she was confronted. Everything on the porch was in a chaotic state, and in the midst of it all sat Sandy calmly licking the baby's face while she on the other hand was crowing rapturously and burying her tiny fingers in the dog's shaggy coat. Mrs. Harder caught her up and dealt Sandy a resounding rap with her sunshade while all the little Harders stood appalled.

"Where is Mrs. Andrews?" cried Mrs. Harder. "How can she neglect baby this way! Look at my porch rug—and my pillows! Oh, dear! That horrid dog must go. He cannot stay here. The butter man comes tomorrow and I shall ask him to take him away."

Doctor Gives Hint to Lucky Salesman

IT'S a wise man that knows when he is slipping. Mr. R. F. Myers of 711 Rosedale Street, Baltimore, had the good fortune to get his tip straight from one of his doctor customers (he was selling for a pharmaceutical house) and since that lucky visit he has increased his business 50 per cent.

For two years he had been driving from town to town, and naturally this threw his elimination out of shape. He felt himself slipping. Cathartics only made him worse. Then one day he was calling on a wise old physician, and asked his advice. "What you need, my boy," said the doctor, "is a simple, easy, normal way to clean the poisons out of your system—we all have them—and with your kind of work they certainly cut down efficiency. Why don't you try Nujol?"

"Well, believe it or not," says Mr. Myers, "in a few days I felt like a new man. 'What's got into you?' asked the home office, 'your business has increased 50 per cent!' "

That's the great thing about Nujol. As soon as it begins to clean the poisons out of your system it makes you feel so well that you can almost always do a much better job.

Nujol is not a medicine and contains no drugs. It is perfectly harmless, forms no habit. It is simply bodily lubrication, which everybody needs. You, like everybody else!

Why put off good health any longer? Go into any good drug store and get a bottle of Nujol in a sealed package. Costs so little and means so much! Maybe you can increase your efficiency 50 per cent too!

Seek Aid to Restore Historic Grub Hill Church

AMELIA COUNTY, VA.

A thousand or more descendants and relatives of men and women who, a hundred years or more ago, were buried in the cemetery of Grub Hill Protestant Episcopal Church, in Amelia County, Virginia, and many others as well have become interested in a project for the restoration of the ancient church and cemetery, the re-marking of all the graves and perpetual care of the historic burying-ground.

These plans have now been perfected—for the repair of the building, the reconstruction of the interior; the beautification of the cemetery, its enclosure by a brick wall, and the laying of flagstone walks therein; and for perpetual care of the church and graves.

Now that the Foundation has been perfected, and legal incorporation completed, the officers and directors will advise all known relatives of those who lie buried there and will seek to learn from them and elsewhere, the names of others. All these will be given opportunity to add to the Foundation fund which will establish and maintain forever a historic shrine and that will mean much to Amelia County and to the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Southern Virginia.

Officers and Directors.

The officers of Grub Hill Memorial Foundation, Inc., are:

George B. Townsend, of Petersburg, President; Mrs. M. M. Eggleston, of Amelia, Vice-President; Philip Freeman, Stony Creek, Chancellor; the Rev. Edwin R. Carter, D. D., Petersburg, Secretary; Rev. J. R. McAllister, Dinwiddie, Treasurer.

this time he had managed to keep out of sight of the swarm of merry youngsters who lived on the street with him.

Then one Saturday mother went to the city to shop, and left Aunt Susan to take care of him.

"I'll wheel you out under the big elm," said Aunt Susan, briskly, when he had finished his breakfast. "It's a delightful morning to be outdoors, and you can watch the boys play ball."

Phil's eyes grew bright and anxious. "Aunt Susan," he began quickly, "I don't go outdoors on Saturdays. Mother wheels me out on the back porch sometimes, but usually I stay in and read."

"Nonsense," said Aunt Susan; "it's cold and damp on the back porch. An hour in the sunshine will do wonders for you."

Aunt Susan was not a person to be turned from her course by coaxing or threats, as Phil well knew from experience. He scowled as she wheeled his chair out into the splendor of the morning. The boys were playing ball in the vacant lot at the corner. He hoped they would not notice him. A year ago he was the best runner of his age in Deming school. Then came the swift, dreadful illness, and now he was a cripple in a chair.

Then Phil forgot his worries watching the game of ball. A big, curly-headed chap was the life of the game. Phil clapped his hands as he made a wonderful home-run. By and by the big fellow threw down the bat and sauntered across the grass toward Phil. The other boys went on playing at a wave of their leader's hand.

"Hullo, kid," sang out the big boy; "I'm Dick Reeves. Who are you?"

"Phil Dyer," he said huskily.

"Glad to you know, Phil," said Dick, throwing himself down on the grass beside Phil's chair. "I saw you watching our game. What did you think of it? We're the Walnut Street Rovers. We're just practicing this morning."

"You have a good team," said Phil; "a very good team," he ended with a sigh.

"Do you play checkers?" asked the big boy, hastily. "I feel just like having a good name now."

Phil's cheeks grew red and his eyes flashed. He rang the little silver bell that stood on the arm of his chair so loudly that Aunt Susan came hurrying to the door to see what was the matter.

"Aunt Susan! Aunt Susan!"he cried, "please find the checker-board for me. Dick and I want to play.'"

Aunt Susan smiled and vanished. An instant later she reappeared with the board and a pan of hot molasses cakes that were so crisp that they melted in your mouth.

Dick smiled as they began to play. He lost the first game and the second and then the third.

Next time Dick scowled thoughtfully over every move, but Phil won with as little effort as before.

Then Dick Reeves sprang to his feet. He put his hands to his mouth and uttered a piercing call. "Fellows, come over here," he ordered; "here's the champion checker-player of the town."

There was a wild shout and the crowd of boys raced across the grass. "Can he beat Charlie Perrigo?" yelled somebody.

"Shouldn't wonder," grinned Dick. "Sit down, Charlie."

Charlie Perrigo was a thin, dark lad, with piercing black eyes. He sat down promptly. The boys ranged around the players. It was a long, drawn-out contest, but Phil was the victor through one rash move of Charlie's.

"You're a wonder," exclaimed Dick. "Say, Phil, would your aunt let you go to the ball game this afternoon with us? We need a bright fellow like you to discover our weak points."

"That's so," agreed the gang.

"I'll wheel your chair," volunteered half a dozen boys at once.

Phil rang the silver bell so hard that it almost cracked. Aunt Susan came running in a hurry. "We want to take Phil to the ball game this afternoon. He is going to be our coach," explained Dick. "We'll bring him home safely."

"Why, that would be splendid," agreed Aunt Susan.

"We need him," said Charlie Perrigo, generously. "He's a splendid thinker."

Phil drew a long breath of rapture. He had found a place in the great boy-world where he was really of use. The boys grinned happily, too.

"Well," said Aunt Susan, shrewdly, "as long as you both need each other, you can both help me in eating up my chocolate cake. Charlie, I'll need you to squeeze lemons. Dick, you may bring out the glasses and the plate, and, Phil, we'll let you cut the cake exactly into the right number of pieces."

All the boys were very happy to be needed, and the boy in the chair glowed with pleasure. Aunt Susan smiled, too. "If the team wins this afternoon, I'll make ice-cream for everybody," she promised.

"I think we'll have chocolate," gloated Phil.

And they did.—Congregationalist.

On Wednesday, October 16th, from 11 to 4 P. M., a unique meeting was held in Christ Church, Millwood, Va., when a jubilee service to celebrate the 25th Anniversary of the founding of the Leper Mission in this church took place. W. M. Danner, general secretary of the American Leper Mission, whose office is in New York City, was present with Mrs. Danner. Mrs. R. R. Harrison, custodian of Pete Banks for Richmond, Va., and Miss E. P. Meriwether, President and Treasurer for Richmond Branch, also attended. Addresses were made by all telling of progress of work throughout the world. The Rector, Rev. B. Duvall Chambers presided and welcomed the delegates. Music was rendered by the choir and a beautiful lunch was served. At 7:30 a meeting was also held in the Presbyterian Church at Winchester, Va., Dr. F. T. McFaden presiding. Mr. Danner has recently returned from Europe, where he attended the opening of a home for Lepers in France, an old monastery being bought at Valbonne and fitted out for them. On Thursday at 3:30 P. M., in the Presbyterian Church, Berryville, Va., another meeting was held where Mr. Danner and other Delegates told the story of the work. And in Zion Church, Charleston, W. Va., Friday, at 10:30 A. M., a final meeting was held and all delegates were present.

Christmas is approaching. It is hoped that a large amount will be given to bring joy and happiness to the Lepers at this season.

Missions is our primary obligation. "Let us think of what is meant by the Christ we do not share with others we may not keep?"

Respectfully submitted,
EVELYN P. MERIWETHER,
President Treasurer Richmond Branch Leper Mission.

Deaths

HITE: MRS. BELLA HITE, on October 31, 1929, passed from her home at Gainesville, Virginia, to her eternal home; from pain and anxiety to Peace, perfect Peace.

MRS. SARAH ANN INGHAM KEDNEY.

MRS. SARAH ANN INGHAM KEDNEY, wife of the late Rev. John Steinfort Kedney, D. D., for many years professor at Seabury Divinty School, Faribault, Minnesota, died in her eighty eighth year, at her home, in Salem, New Jersey, on Sunday, November 3rd.

She was buried from the parish church of St. John's, Salem, on the following Wednesday, the Rev. Thomas V. Wingate, rector of the parish, the Rev. Ellison J. Perot, a former rector, and the Rev. A. A. Abbott, D. D., Senior Canon of Trinity Cathedral, Cleveland, Ohio, officiating. The interment was by the side of her husband in the grave yard surrounding the church.

Mrs. Kedney was a woman of rare culture and refinement, peculiarly endowed with a sympathetic understanding of others. She kept abreast of all the social, political and religious problems of the day, as well a all the activities for betterment in her own community. Her charities were broad and generous.

IN MEMORIAM.

ELIZABETH LEWIS CARRINGTON DUNLOP.

On the night of October 27 "God touched her and she slept". I do not try to speak of the wonderful intellect, or her genius for motherhood, or the beautiful relationship that was hers as daughter, sister and wife, for when I think on the life of Bessie Dunlop one word seems to overshadow all others to me and that is Friend. I do not remember the time when I did not know her, and in all these years her loyal devotion to my family is one of the beautiful things I like to think on, an enrichment it was to all who were fortunate enough to win her friendship, for once given it was never recalled. There was a man once who, when asked for the inspiration of his life, simply said, "I had a friend"! Such an answer might be made by many who won the friendship of dear Bessie Dunlop. Loyal love, fearless truth and trust in God shone in her face and breathed in her actions, so that those who knew her were bound to be the better for it in life, and now in remembrance. We who love her feel very lonely but we feel "this is not the end, rather the fulfillment", of that brave, heroic life she lived amongst us. Dear, "loyal heart and true", we leave you standing here in the light, "and as we think on you we say as St. Paul of old, "We thank our God on every remembrance of you".

RESOLUTIONS.

Rev. J. W. Cantey Johnson.

Whereas, It has pleased Almighty God, in His infinite wisdom, to remove from the field of his earthly activities and ministrations our beloved rector and pastor, J. W. CANTEY JOHNSON; and, whereas, the Vestry desire to use these means to express and show our deep sorrow at his taking, and to recognize his worth to his church and community;

Now, therefore, Be it resolved that the members of the Vestry of Saint Mark's Church, Gastonia, N. C., are profoundly moved by the realization of this great loss the City of Gastonia and the Diocese in which he labored so faithfully and with so much steadfastness of purpose. He was true and loyal to every duty and obligation which devolved upon him as rector of this parish for the past nine and one half years, and the multitude of labors and duties which he assumed and took upon himself in the interest of his church, his community and his fellowman, he discharged with conspicuous ability and wisdom, always sustained by a constant and abiding faith in the guidance of Divine Providence.

Be it further Resolved, That we extend to the family of our deceased leader our deep sympathy in the irrparable loss which has been visited upon them, and we appreciate the high esteem in which he was held by the people of Gastonia and by those in the field in which he labored, through the years since he has been with us.

Be it further resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be furnished his family, a copy spread upon the minutes and copies furnished the Southern Churchman, the Highland Churchman and the Gastonia Gazette.

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE.

privilege. The clergy have been urged to exert themselves as never before to so present the work of the Church in the Diocese of Florida, that some advance work may be undertaken next year as well as the urgent necessity for maintaining work already in existence in a fully adequate manner. The home work has suffered during the past year because of the shortage of funds and the curtailment of work made necessary thereby, but, as a whole, the clergy are solidly behind Bishop Juhan and a spirit of optimism, backed by the intention to "Pray, Plan and Perform"—the Bishop's slogan for the fall campaign was manifested.

The sessions of the conference on the second day were held in St. John's Parrish, the Rev. Newton Middleton, rector. Discussions on this day were in preparation for the work of the next few weeks: The Bishop outlined the Organization and Program ahead of his clergy and their congregations, after which he called on the Rev. Messrs. Wm. S. Stoney, of Holy Trinity. Church, Gainesville, and Wm. Jeffery Alfriend, of St. John's Church, Tallahassee, to present plans that have worked so successfully in their parishes, looking toward the Education and Preparation for and Methods of the Canvass. The Canvass will take place, in the majority of the congregations on December 1—the Bishop urging that they be completed within the following week.

The Advance Work Program of the Church was presented by the Bishop of the Diocese and the closing meditation on "Our Mission", led by the Rev. Newton Middleton, was a fitting and uplifting close to a most helpful and enthusiastic gathering. Every clergyman on the diocesan staff was present with the exception of the Rev. Curtis Crubb, who was prevented from attending by illness.

Delightful luncheons were served to the clergy on both days by the Ladies' Guilds of the Church of the Good Shepherd and St. John's.

PITTSBURGH.

Rt. Rev. Alexander Mann, D. D., Bishop.

Ordained.

George William Lewis was ordained to the diaconate in Gethsemane Cathedral, Fargo, North Dakota, on Sunday morning, October 27. He is the fourth man to go out into the ministry from St. Stephen's Church, Wilkinsburg, Pa., during the eleven years' rectorship there of the Rev. William Porkess, D. D. This is believed to be a record for any parish in the Diocese of Pittsburgh.

OKLAHOMA.

Rt. Rev. Thomas Casady, S. T. D., Bishop.

Record Attendance.

With only sixteen communicants the mission at Cleveland, Oklahoma, has a record attendance at services which averages fifty. The congregation is meeting in a renovated dwelling which will soon have to be enlarged.

Pawhuska, Oklahoma, is supported by the rich Osage Indians. Their oil lands are playing out. Quarterly payments by the government have dropped from $4,000 a few years ago to only $800. Episcopalians in that quarter have begun to cry hard times, and it really will bring a lot of distress to many.

Dream of Maury Memorial True After Years of Toil

ASSOCIATION WHICH HAS LED IN MOVEMENT OF STATUE FORMED IN RICHMOND AFTER LETTER OF ADVOCACY WRITTEN IN 1912

By R. B. Munford, Jr.

The unveiling of the Matthew Fontaine Maury monument, at Monument Avenue nad Roseneath Road, Richmond, on Monday afternoon marked the happy culmination of a movement to honor the memory of this great scientist that was started fifteen or more years ago and that has been carried on to its successful conclusion through the efforts of a patriotic band of men and women inspired by the untiring leadership of Mrs. E. E. Moffitt, of Richmond, the president of the Maury Association.

During the years intervening between the organization of the association and the unveiling ceremonies, many of those who gave their time and effort to this patriotic endeavor have passed away—but happily their devoted president has been spared to see the perfection of the undertaking, although she herself is now aged and will be unable to attend the unveiling ceremonies in person.

Credit to Her Zeal

It is to Mrs. Moffitt, as founder and president of the association, and to her unfailing zeal, that acclaim must be justly given by her fellow citizens for the ultimate placing of the splendid Maury monument on an avenue in this city that has already become famous as one of the notable streets in the country.

The story of the formation of the Maury Association is an interesting one that may be traced back to the winter of 1912, when a citnzen of Richmond addressed a letter to one of the local papers, advocating the formation of such an association for the purpose of erecting a statue, in his native State, to the great "Pathfinder of the Seas."

She is to-day the titular head of the organization and its inspiration, although the infirmities of age have recently prevented her from attending its meetings.

It was on May 11, 1915, that the Matthew Fontaine Maury Association was formally organized at the Woman's Club, in Richmond.

During the autumn of 1919 members of the General Assembly of Virginia were addressed by letter asking that they give their support to a bill that was to be introduced at the approaching 1920 session of their body and that was to ask an appropriation from the State in the furtherance of the Maury movement. Such a bill was introduced in the State Senate on Maury's birthday, January 14, 1920, Senator Cannon of Richmond being the patron of the bill.

$10,000 Appropriated

By the terms of this bill, which became law, the sum of $10,000 was appropriated for the purpose contemplated and the money was deposited with a local trust company and was appreciably increased by the interest accumulated.

At this period the school children of Virginia were asked to help the monument fund and they did so with good will. Approximately $2,000 was contributed in this way—children from all sections of Virginia giving their help. The contributions came generously from not only the white school children, but from the negroes and the Indians. An appropriation of $10,000 was also later made by the city of Richmond, which is ever willing to take part in honoring the great men, both of Virginia and the South.

Mrs. Moffitt during these years attended several national conventions of the United Daughters of the Confederacy and, largely through her presentation of the matter, the Daughters of the Confederacy agreed to contribute $5,000 to the monument fund. Mrs. Frank A. Walke, of Norfolk, as chairman of the monument committee of the United Daughters of the Confederacy, gave her assistance to the movement, and in recognition of this assistance, Mrs. Walke and also Mrs. Livingston Schuyler, president-general of the Daughters, were guests of honor here when the cornerstone of the Maury monument was finally laid, June 22, 1922. At that time Mrs. Moffitt and Mrs. Walke were presented to the large assemblage and Mrs. Schuyler was among those invited to speak.

Confederate Occasion

The appropriations that had been made by the State, the city, and the Daughters of the Confederacy were generous to be sure—but they were by no means sufficient to assure the erection of the monument.

The financial objective of the association had been fixed as $60,000, and in order that this amount should be raised, an intensive campaign was necessary. A finance committee was therefore created in 1926, with Gus M. Schwarzschild, of Richmond, as its chairman. This committee was composed of thirty or more leading Richmond citizens and their efforts and their generosity assured the completion of the Maury monument. Mr. Schwarzschild was particularly assisted in his final work to secure the necessary funds by Herbert W. Jackson and Walker Scott, of this city—both of whom have continued to devote their efforts and time to the completion of the monument and to the final plans for the unveiling ceremonies.

A complete list of the men and women who, at one time or another, have evinced their patriotis interest in the completion of the Maury monument would indeed be a long and distinguished one.

Mrs. Jackson, Treasurer

Mrs. Herbert W. Jackson has continuously filled the important office of treasurer of the Maury Association; and associated with her have been several prominent Richmond women who are vice-presidents of the organization. They are: Mrs. John H. Southall, Mrs. Thomas Catesby Jones, and Mrs. Beverly T. Crump. Mr. Lichtenstein is secretary.

Three of the vice-presidents of the association have passed away during recent years. They were: Mrs. Norman V. Randolph, Miss Lucy T. Munford, and Mrs. Mann S. Valentine, each of them being affectionately recalled by Richmond people because of their high type of patriotism.

With the necessary funds assured, the next problem of the Maury Association, of course, was the selection of an artist to create the monument. And in the choice of F. W. Sievers, the distinguished Richmond sculptor, for this commission the association has been most fortunate.

Mr. Sievers was already well known as the artist who had designed the equestrian statue of General Lee and its accompanying figures that stand out so notably at Gettysburg, and constitute one of the great monuments on that historic field.

Highly Commended

The seated figure of Commander Maury, which was placed in its position last September, has been highly commended by all who have seen it, because of its artistic merit and dignity and the happy manner in which it depicts the fine brow and thoughtful bearing of a great thinker and noble gentleman.

In designing the group which surmounts the whole memorial, Mr. Sievers has departed from the established classical standards in such things and has succeeded in attaining an originality of conception that is very remarkable.

Considered in its entirety, it may be safely said that the whole memorial is one worthy of the great man whom it honors and of the Richmond artist by whom it has been created.—News Leader, Richmond, Va.

THANKSGIVING DAY

Come, ye thankful people, come,
Raise the song of harvest-home:
All is safely gathered in,
Ere the winter storms begin;
God, our Maker doth provide
For our wants to be supplied;
Come to God's own temple, come,
Raise the song of harvest-home.

All the world is God's own field,
Fruit unto His praise to yield;
Wheat and tares together sown,
Unto joy or sorrow grown:
First the blade, and then the ear,
Then the full corn shall appear;
Grant, O harvest Lord, that we Wholesome grain and pure may be.

For the Lord our God shall come,
And shall take His harvest home;
From His field shall in that day
All offences purge away;
Give His angels charge at last
In the fire the tares to cast,
But the fruitful ears to store
In His garner evermore.

Even so, Lord, quickly come
To Thy final harvest-home;
Gather Thou Thy people in,
Free from sorrow, free from sin;
There, forever purified,
In Thy presence to abide:
Come, with all Thine angels, come,
Raise the glorious harvest-home.

My Dear Mr. Williams:

Your kind inquiry of the time we ship our pansy plants got to us yesterday. We ship all through the winter, but mostly in November and February. November is the best month in the year to get them out. As high up as you are they would probably need some little protection in the very cold nights in January. We have been specializing on the pansy for ten years and now can't begin to supply the demand. We have originated and perfected our own "special mixture", which seemed to have taken the day, and, with the help of your Southern Churchman, have given them a wide advertising in your paper ever since we started the work, ten years ago, and it has given us the best of results; so much so, that it has "put us in a hole", in that we can no longer supply the demand and will have to hold up for the time being. We sell them at regulation prices—50c a dozen, $1.75 for 50 and $3.00 per 100, postpaid. Before December 1 our supply for fall planting will be exhausted. Till then we can fill all orders, I think.

It might interest you to know that I am one of the "old guard" of 1876, and in that far-off day read every thing that your kinsman, Alfred B. Williams, wrote during the Hampton Campaign in our State. South Carolina owes Alfred B. Williams a debt that it can never repay. No man in that day played a more important part in the redemption of our State than he—not even Hampton himself.

GRADING WINNSBORO GRANITE.

Vast as are the deposits of granite, only a very meagre percentage is available for monumental purposes. Even in the great Anderson quarries of the Winnsboro Granite Corporation, Rion, S. C., though the granite mass is wonderfully uniform, surpassing most noted granite quarries in this particular, only about 50 per cent of the granite quarried is considered sufficiently perfect to grade as "Winnsboro Granite".

A very simple test is used at the quarries. A block of stone is thoroughly wet with water. This brings out clearly any and all defects, regarded as defects by the trade. Blocks showing defects are graded as seconds, and are known as "Smith stock".

A third grade, with larger defects, is used for paving blocks; while blocks carrying stains are used only for ballast. Winnsboro Granite must be free from stains, white or black streaks, white or black splotches of size, and must be also free from waves (variation in mixture of light and dark crystals) in the grain. The first grade product, known as "Winnsboro Grante," must be even in texture, of straight grain, giving a uniformly beautiful, even-grained surface.

When buying a monument, be sure to impress your dealer that you do not wish Smith stock or seconds, but must have "Winnsboro Granite"—first grade granite of one of the very greatest granite quarries of the world.

Send for latest free booklet of designs to Winnsboro Granite Corporation, Rion, S. C., and insist on your dealer supplying you a quarry guarantee that the stone used in your monument is "Winnsboro Granite"—a guarantee signed by the management of the Winnsboro Granite Corporation.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

"All that He ever was He ever is."

"It is a greater thing to cause another to walk steadily on than it is to carry his load."

Whenever our judgments and our feelings lack patience they also lack wisdom and virtue.—R. W. Emerson.

I the arrow, Thou the bow, the bowman and the mark;
Speed me, O Thou! to the goal of Thy Godhead.

—J. M. W.

I am fully persuaded that religious grace can steal from the playtimes of life into the secret haunts of the soul. —J. H. Dunn.

God is love, and in Him is no fear at all; and because God made man in His own image and likeness, fear is unconstitutional with mankind.—William Farwell.

"Jesus, these eyes have never seen that radiant form of Thine:
The veil of sense hangs dark between
Thy blessed face and mine:
I see Thee not, I hear Thee not, yet
art Thou oft with me,
And earth hath ne'er so dear a spot
as where I meet with thee!"

Jesus, Deliverer!
Come Thou to me:
Soothe Thou my voyaging
Over Life's sea.
Thou, when the storm of Death
Roars, sweeping by,
Whisper, O Truth of Truth
—"Peace! It is I."

—Anatolius.

"Lord, help me! is a prayer that a thousand will offer, where one will pray, "Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?" There are not men who would be willing to have God for an assistant; but God for a Master is not sought generally. Yet he who would be a worker together with God must be ready to work as God's servant, or as God's child.—Selected.

On the whole, there is no possession as valuable as good habits, for this means not only is the mind pledged and consecrated to good, but the muscles are supple, and even the bones are bent to what is good.—James Stalker.

Christian faith is a grand cathedral with divinely pictured windows. Standing without, you see no glory, nor can possibly imagine any. Standing within, every ray of light reveals a harmony of unspeakable splendors. — Nathaniel Hawthorne.

In a world where there is so much to ruffle the spirit's plumes, how needful that entering into the secret of his pavilion which will alone bring it back to composure and peace! In a world where there is so much to sadden and depress, how blessed that communion with Him in whom is the one true source and fountain of all true gladness and abiding joy! In a world where so much is ever seeking to unhallow our spirits, to render them common and profane, how high the privilege of consecrating them anew in prayer to holiness and to God!—R. C. Trench.

THANKSGIVING

This republic is in position unexampled in history. It stands forth as the acknowledged dominant power among nations and striving, generously and faithfully, to use its dominance for the peace, well-being and advancement of all mankind. Ancient Rome, at its zenith, was supreme. In a world far larger than Rome knew we have supremacy without Rome's rapacity. Through the passing centuries kingdoms and empires have expanded their dominions by slaughter and devastation and multiplication of human miseries, or by crafty use of human weaknesses and vices. We seek no new territories or subjects. Those that have been thrust upon our care we try earnestly and hopefully to train and fit for self-government, self-protection and freedom. We seek conquest by alleviation of sorrows and disasters, victories by beneficence. Each increase of our influence is for banishment of hates and fears, substitution for war and death of good will and helpfulness, for woe and tears and terrors the smiles and happiness of tranquil security. We strive that valor and labor shall no more be desecrated for destruction and bloodshed, shall be consecrated for service of God and humanity.

That is the impulse and purpose and hope of the vast majority, the controlling and directing force, of the hundred and twenty million American people. Perhaps we give our fellow citizens of the planet nothing better, as demonstration of our guiding principles and as example, than our annual Thanksgiving Day. No other country or people has it. It is an impressive, magnificent, phenomenon of spiritual fidelity and stability when the mightiest of earthly powers sets apart a day of each year on which to bow itself before the Almighty, unseen Power, acknowledge its dependence on Him and His mercy and that before Him all our potential strength in arms, our numbers and skill and unlimited wealth and resources are dust and vanity and futility. The day is annual evidence of the survival, vitality and undiminishing sway of the religion on which the country was founded, by which it has been built and sustained; an annual triumph of the underlying, governing thoughts and ideals, so much obscured by clamors of frivolities and follies and ostentatious animosity against God and by continual parade of crime. It is annual occasion, also, for honest, candid, courageous review of both national and individual life and progress since last Thanksgiving.

As a people we surely have ample reason to be humbly and fervently grateful to the Giver of all good. We have been spared from far-reaching calamity and provided with bounteous means for relieving what distress has come, within and beyond our own borders. We continue to straighten, gradually, our economic and political tangles. We have been enabled to perform usefully and creditably tasks of supervision, readjustment and guardianship imposed upon us by obligations to less fortunate or dependent peoples. We have been blessed with peace and cordial fellowship among ourselves and have faced no threat or danger of trouble abroad. Whatever personal or sectional misfortunes may have come, the country, as a whole, has prospered beyond all precedent. For the average man and woman the comforts and pleasures and relief from daily burdens and pains have increased and become constantly more easily and generally attainable. We realize this clearly by a moment of contrast of present conditions and those of twenty-five or fifty years back or of comparison of our living conditions with those of elsewhere. Chiefly by the leadership and patient, persistent, efforts of our government, distinct and encouraging onward steps toward universal peace and abolition of war have been made. All of which gives us abundant reason, as a people, for devout and fervent gratitude and makes expression of that gratitude by lip, from hearts and by act, solemn and imperative duty.

The churches have held their ground, perhaps have gained somewhat. They are yet far from being strong as we could make them, if we obeyed loyally the commands of God and proved by our lives and acts real understanding of what we owe to the tender love and wonderful sacrifice of God's Son, our Holy Saviour. Purposely, consideration of the churches has held to the last because the churches bring before each of us the question and issue of individual duty and responsibility and loyalty to trust. As we send up our thanks and supplications, all of us, reviewing our conduct and searching our hearts through the year since last Thanksgiving Day, must know that we have received and enjoyed much more mercy and blessing than we earned or deserved. Our souls may swell with exultant pride as we note what our country is doing to make the world better and we may glory in the endeavors of president, cabinet and congress; but exultation yields to mortification and pride to shame as we recall how pitifully we have failed in service to our own churches and in knowing and meeting the needs and giving help to those immediately around us, easily within our reach, maybe our daily contacts. Our nation gives example to all nations of allegiance to the Creator and recognition of His omnipotence and compassion. What example do we plan to give on the designated and consecrated day? Will we go to offer publicly our tributes of thanks and praise and good resolves, or will we vulgarize the day, turn our backs on the sanctuary and use the day for our own pleasures, or soil it with trivial concerns or sordid indulgences?

Thanksgiving is proclaimed testimony of the living religion and religious faith and belief of the American people. It is a fit time for the reawakening and arousing of the religious zeal of each American citizen. It is a time for vivid realization of our own infirmities, our shortcomings and sins of omission and commission. As we offer our thanks, let us humble our hearts, remembering the multitude of mercies and deliverances granted us and the pitifully little good we have accomplished, or even attempted, and resolve very staunchly that with the Almighty help we will do more and better. As we pray "Thy Kingdom come" and ask that our country may achieve for God and righteousness and mankind in the world, let us ask, too, that we be given strength and resolution to do our parts within our own circles, our own congregations.

Alfred B. Williams.

Birds of a Feather Flock Together

It is most striking to see that one of the first results of the meeting of our radical friends in New York, called to promote Church Unity, is to cause divisions in the Protestant Episcopal Church.

Lack of proper respect for law and order and regular church discipline and willingness to submit to the canons and rules of our Protestant Episcopal Church in America, has, in our opinion, led Revs. Carl Grammer of Philadelphia, Robert Norwood of New York and Beverley D. Tucker, Jr., of Virginia, and the ten other socialistic visionaries to send a most Bolshevistic written protest against Bishop Manning of New York governing his own churches in his own diocese; although these churches were by special resolutions subject to the control of Bishop Manning, by resolutions of rectors and vestries at the time the churches were dedicated.

Some of the gems of this protest are as follows:

Referring to Bishop Manning's ruling, they say:

"It is not in ACCORD WITH A SANE AND LIBERAL INTERPRETATION OF the Canon which restricts such officiating in a 'congregation' of this church and says nothing in our judgment about officiating in the edifice."

"The rector and vestry are the legal owners of the property and the action of the Bishop is, in our opinion, a usurpation of authority under the guise of interpreting the Canon. The rector and vestry had decided that they possessed the right to lend the building for such an occasion and purpose as this conference, by both civil and canonical law. The only authority competent to deny their interpretation was the courts. We understand that the rector and vestry waive their right for the present because the controversy was unpleasant to the officers of the conference."

"We hope, however, that they will not let the matter rest here, but will secure some weighty legal opinion confuting the Bishop's claims. Concessions out of courtesy to authority are full of danger to constitutional government. Exacted courtesies, if granted, become tyrannies."

"He has shown a narrowness of interpretation in regard to the Canon that is hurtful to the Church's best interest," etc.

"This one-sidedness of discipline must deprive his ruling in this case of any weight with impartial people."

The unlucky thirteen wind up their ill-mannered protest by saying that Bishop Manning's order against Mr. Coffin administering the Holy Communion in St. George's "should be resisted and disavowed."

We strongly recommend that the unlucky thirteen signers of this Modernist Churchly Declaration of Independence adjourn to Moscow, for the good of our Church in America.

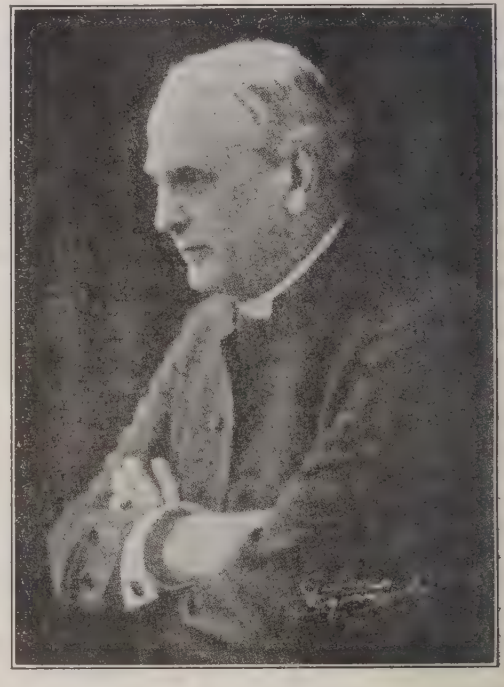
BISHOP ANDERSON OF CHICAGO ELECTED PRESIDING BISHOP.

Meeting in the beautiful little Bethlehem Chapel of Washington Cathedral, on Wednesday, November 13, the House of Bishops elected the Rt. Rev. Charles Palmerston Anderson, D. D., Bishop of Chicago, to fill the highest official position offered by the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States. Elected Presiding Bishop, he also automatically becomes President of the National Council, and thus holds the position which is the nearest American analogy to the place held in the Church of England by the Archbishop of Canterbury.



This special session of the House of Bishops was called by the Rt. Rev. William Andrew Leonard, D. D., Senior Bishop, to elect a successor to the late Bishop John Gardner Murray. Bishop Anderson will hold office until the next election for the six-year term of Presiding Bishop by the General Convention to meet in Denver in 1931.

The session opened with a service of the Holy Communion at nine-thirty Wednesday morning. Ninety-four bishops knelt before the altar to receive the Holy Sacrament, and to ask God's guidance and a right judgment.

The first business was the election of the Rev. S. Harrington Littell, of Hankow, China, as Missionary Bishop to Honolulu. This post has been vacant since the death last year of the beloved Bishop La Mothe. The Rev. Harry Beal, Deanof St. Paul's Cathedral, Los Angeles, California was elected to this charge by the bishops at their last meeting in Atlantic City, but he declined the election. The Rev. Mr. Littell is a highly consecrated man, has had many years' missionary experience in foreign lands and, if he accepts, should prove a very fortunate choice for the Church in Hawaii.

The balloting for the Presiding Bishop is taken in secret. There is no nomination from the floor, but every one writes on a slip of paper his choice. Consequently there were a great number of bishops to receive one vote or more on the first ballot. The balloting gradually narrowed down, however, to two bishops, with practically even groups supporting Bishop Henry St. George Tucker, of Virginia, and Bishop James DeWolf Perry, Jr., of Rhode Island. Ballot after ballot proved the deadlock in which the necessary majority of sixty-eight votes could be procured for neither bishop.

Proposals for adjournment for lunch and then again for the postponement of the election until the next day were waived aside, and the balloting continued. Finally Bishop Anderson, Vice-Chairman of the House of Bishops, was put forward with a strong vote. On the sixteenth ballot he was elected. He had not received strong support in the early part of the day on account of his ill health. However, when it seemed impossible for a decision to be reached and he received the majority of votes, he graciously accepted the election. He appointed the Rt. Rev. Hugh Latimer Burleson, Bishop of South Dakota, as his Assessor, and this appointment was confirmed by the House. Bishop Burleson served in this position for Bishop Murray and also for the few weeks with Bishop Leonard.

The House of Bishops finally adjourned at twenty minutes to seven o'clock Wednesday evening.

Bishop Anderson was born in Ontario, Canada, September 9, 1865. He was ordained Deacon in 1887 and Priest in 1888 by Bishop Lewis of Ontario. He received the degree of Doctor of Divinity from Trinity College, Toronto, in 1900. He first served as minister-in-charge at Beachburg, Ontario. From 1891-1900 he was rector of Grace Church, Oak Park, Illinois. On February 24, 1900 he was consecrated Bishop of Bishops McLaren, Gillespie and Seymour, and served as Bishop-Coadjutor of the Diocese of Chicago until he became full bishop in 1905.

The Bishop is the author of several books, including, "Letters to Laymen," "The Religion of Our Lord," and "Religion and Morality."

Bishop Anderson is one of the ablest men in the episcopate. He is a man of splendid ideas and a wonderful speaker. Many remember his stirring, inspiring address at the opening service of the General Convention in Washington in October, 1928, and his strong defense of separation of Church and State, which won wide acclaim. It was largely due to an address which he delivered at the Convention in Detroit in 1919 that the Nation-Wide Campaign was adopted. We can, therefore, feel confident that he will give active support and interest to the Missionary Work of the Church. Bishop Anderson is also a strong advocate for Church Unity. Summing up, Bishop Anderson is a broad-minded Churchman, a man whom every one admires, and as presiding officer of our Church one in whom we may all have great confidence.

THE NEW HUMANITY

By the Venerable F. W. Neve, D. D.

Archdeacon of the Blue Ridge.

PART I.

CHRIST AS HE IS TODAY.

AT the time of the Peace Conference in Paris, at the close of the Great War, three of the leading and outstanding statesmen who took part in its deliberations, namely: President Wilson, Lloyd George and General Smuts of South Africa, gave expression to the conviction that Christianity could alone save the world and civilization.

They seem to have felt that no statesman or group or statesmen, no matter how sincere their desire, or how able their minds, could ensure the permanence of civilization. Christ to them was the one Hope of the world.

But how must He be presented to men to win their acceptance and homage? This is a vital question as may be seen from what follows.

It has been the fashion, if we may call it so, for our learned men to suppose that the proper method of approach to men and women of the present day is to emphasize our Lord's humanity to such an extent as practically to exclude His Divinity, or at any rate, to throw it into a shadowy background so as to apparently attract as little attention to it as possible.

Now, one can understand this point of view on the part of those who do not believe in the Divinity of Christ, but it is difficult to understand the use of this method by those who do believe in Him as the Son of God.

It seems, however, to be due to a very prevalent idea that a presentation of Christ to the world must be adapted and conformed to what is known as the modern mind, which, however, it may be noted, does not represent a fixed standard of ideas, but is changing all the time; and it may well be asked whether it is not the duty of the Church rather to seek to transform the modern mind into conformity with the Mind of Christ.

There are, too, some serious difficulties in connection with the over-emphasizing of the humanity of Christ and the consequent minimizing of His divinity. The well-known scientist, Aldous Huxley, in a recent volume of essays makes the following significant statement: "But when all that is at present measurable in man has been duly measured, there remains a vast domain that cannot be accurately explored with the surveying instruments of physical science."

This reveals the modesty of the man of science due to a clear consciousness of the limitations under which he is working and suggests the thought, that if there is a vast domain in human nature which lies beyond the present reach of the scientific method, it may well be stated that the God Man, Jesus Christ, must represent far vaster domains incapable of exploration even by the modern mind; and this would seem to imply that any representation of Christ which can be comprehended by the modern mind and thus meet its requirements cannot be a true and accurate one.

And here another difficulty presents itself. The emphasis that is being placed on the humanity of Christ, almost to the exclusion of His divinity, gives the impression that His humanity is more important than His Divinity, or, in other words, that His humanity is the primary fact with regard to Him and His divinity merely secondary, which would be placing our human nature above the divine. This, too, would seem to make Christ's human nature an end in itself, rather than a medium through which God can manifest Himself to us and we can approach and hold communion with Him.

There is another necessary development arising out of this and that is the attempt to revise the New Testament in such a way as to shade off everything which would prove that Christ was divine in the interests of a strictly human presentation.

If the New Testament is allowed to speak for itself there is no question that it represents Christ as the Son of God. For Christ Himself is described by it as making this claim and the Apostles and the Early Church bore unmistakable witness to the same truth. But it is supposed that the modern world will not accept this witness as it stands, especially the supernatural element, and it is, therefore, considered necessary to eliminate the supernatural and give the record, as far as possible, a natural explanation.

This brings up the question as to whether it would not be better to tell the truth; that we believe Christ to be the Son of God. There is really nothing to be gained by representing His as something entirely different from what He was believed to be by those who were closely associated with Him, and were especially chosen by Him to receive the revelation of Himself as the Son of God in order that they might be able to interpret Him as such to their fellow men. If we believe their witness and do accept Him ourselves as the Son of God it is our duty and privilege to pass on that same witness unimpaired to our fellow-men.

It is impossible to isolate that short period of time when Christ was here on earth and ignore what followed, namely, His passing out of that earthly experience and His resumption of that power and Majesty, which was His from all eternity. The New Testament represents the prelude to the exaltation of the Son of God to the Headship of all created things, and as having all power and authority in heaven and earth with the promise that His divine presence would be with His people to the end of time.

Christ, as He was then, cannot be understood without relating Him to what He is now, because He is now in a position to make effective, for the whole world, the experience that He gained and the work that He did when He was here on earth.

The New Testament, as it speaks for itself, is more closely in line and more completely in harmony with the divine glory with which He is now invested. What are the supernatural elements of the Gospel, the Virgin Birth, the miracles, compared with the supernatural accompaniments of His present exalted position as King of Kings and Lord of Lords?

The humiliation and the exaltation are so completely interwoven that we cannot consider them separately as isolated parts of His great work of redemption. "He humbled Himself, . . . , Wherefore God hath also highly exalted Him and given Him a name which is above every name that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, . . . and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father."

It is difficult to see how the presentation of Christ which is considered to be necessary now in order to conform to the modern mind can be said to be in harmony with what we believe Him to be in the actual present.

And this leads us to the further question as to whether it is not, after all, a mistake to suppose that the presentation of Christ as Divine, with all the authority of the Son of God, is not the best and most convincing method of bringing Him before men.

For the modern world is more concerned, perhaps, about reality than any thing else; and to present Christ to men as He was once, without relating that earthly life to what He is now, and thus to practically ignore the position which He now holds would seem to lay the Church open to a charge of insincerity. Men might well say, "You are not presenting Christ to us as you believe Him to be now, and that is what we really want to know."

As to the supposition that the world will not believe that Christ is the Son of God, we should remember that when Christians were few in numbers and insignficant in social influence and the unbelieving world was in a vast majority, the Church was not cowed or daunted by the opposing forces of Roman brute force and the contempt of Greek intellectualism.

She bore witness without fear to the truth that Jesus Christ was the Son of God and Western Civilization came into being through the victory of her faith in Christ as her Divine Leader over an unbelieving world. "The truth is mighty and will prevail", whereas if we put Christ's divinity in the background as if we are afraid or ashamed to confess the Truth, such betrayal of our trust may well result in the world coming to the conclusion that we do not ourselves believe in His claim to be the Son of God.

Christ Himself said that the confession of faith in Him as the Son of God was the Rock upon which He would build His Church, and that the gates of hell would not prevail against it; while St. John, giving his testimony to the same truth, wrote: "This is the victory that overcometh the world even our faith. Who is he that overcometh the world, but he that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God?"

This divine strategy, of the early Church, won for her a mighty victory against seemingly overwhelming odds; far greater odds than we are confronted with today. Have we forgotten that: "The weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of strongholds." If the Church would use her spiritual weapons, those which God himself has given her to carry on her warfare, and not be afraid to proclaim Christ to men as the eternal Son of God, who alone is the Hope of the world, then a new and higher type of humanity might appear, capable under His guidance, and aided by His power, of creating a new civilization, such as the prophets have foreseen and foretold, the realization of which the world is still awaiting.

WESTMINSTER THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY

By the Reverend J. Gresham Machen, D. D., Litt. D.

(Address delivered at the opening of Westminster Seminary in Witherspoon Hall, Philadelphia, on Wednesday afternoon, September 25, 1929.)

WESTMINSTER THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, which opens its doors today, will hardly be attended by those who seek the plaudits of the world or the plaudits of a worldly church. It can offer for the present no magnificent buildings, no long-established standing in the ecclesiastical or academic world. Why, then, does it open its doors; why does it appeal to the support of Christian men?

The answer is plain. Our new institution is devoted to an unpopular cause; it is devoted to the service of One who is despised and rejected by the world and increasingly belittled by the visible church, the majestic Lord and Saviour who is presented to us in the Word of God. From Him men are turning away one by one. His sayings are too hard, His deeds of power too strange, His atoning death too great an offense to human pride. But to Him, despite all, we hold. No Christ of our own imaginings can ever take His place for us, no mystic Christ whom we seek merely in the hidden depths of our own souls. From all such we turn away ever anew to the blessed written Word and say to the Christ there set forth, the Christ with whom then we have living communion: "Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life."

The Bible, then, which testifies of Christ, is the centre and core of that with which Westminster Seminary has to do. Very different is the attitude of most theological institutions today. Most seminaries, with greater or less clearness and consistency, regard not the Bible alone, or the Bible in any unique sense, but the general phenomenon of religion as being the subject-matter of their course. It is the duty of the theological student, they maintain, to observe various types of religious experience, attested by the Bible considered as a religious classic, but attested also by the religious conditions that prevail today, in order to arrive by a process of comparison at that type of religious experience which is best suited to the needs of the modern man. We believe, on the contrary, that God has been pleased to reveal Himself to man and to redeem man once for all from the guilt and power of sin. The record of that revelation and that redemption is contained in the Holy Scriptures, and it is with the Holy Scriptures, and not merely with the human phenomenon of religion, that candidates for the ministry should learn to deal.

There is nothing narrow about such a curriculum; many and varied are the types of intellectual activity that it requires. When you say that God has revealed Himself to man, you must in the first place believe that God is and that the God who is is one who can reveal Himself, no blind world-force, but a living Person. There we have one great division of the theological course. "Philosophical apologetics" or "theism", it is called. But has this God, who might reveal Himself, actually done so in the way recorded in the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments? In other words, is Christianity true? That question, we think, should not be evaded; and what is more, it need not be evaded by any Christian man. To be a Christian is, we think, a truly reasonable thing; Christianity flourishes not in obscurantist darkness, where objections are ignored, but in the full light of day.

But if the Bible contains a record of revelation and redemption, what in detail does the Bible say? In order to answer that question, it is not sufficient to be a philosopher: by being a philosopher, you may perhaps determine, or think you can determine, what the Bible ought to say; but if you are to tell what the Bible does say, you must be able to read the Bible for yourself. And you cannot read the Bible for yourself unless you know the languages in which it was written. We may sometimes be tempted to wish that the Holy Spirit had given us the Word of God in a language better suited to our particular race, in a language that we could easily understand; but in His mysterious wisdom He gave it to us in Hebrew and in Greek. Hence if we want to know the Scriptures, to the study of Greek and Hebrew, we must go. I am not sure that it will be ill for our souls. It is poor consecration indeed that is discouraged by a little earnest work; and sad is it for the church if it has only ministers whose preparation for their special calling is of the customary superficial kind.

We are not conducting a school for lay workers at Westminster Seminary, useful though such a school would be, but a theological seminary; and we believe that a theological seminary is an institution of higher learning whose standards should not be inferior to the highest academic standards that anywhere prevail.

If, then, the students of our seminary can read the Bible not merely in translations, but as it was given by the Holy Spirit to the church, then they are prepared to deal intelligently with the question what the Bible means. There we have the great subject of Biblical exegesis or Biblical interpretation. I hesitate to use that word "interpretation"; for it is a word that has been the custodian of more nonsense, perhaps, than any other word in the English language today. Every generation, it is said, must interpret the Bible and the creeds of the church in its own way. So it is said in effect by many modern leaders of the church: "We accept the Apostles' Creed, but we must interpret the Apostles' Creed in a way that will suit the modern mind. So we repeat the assertion of the Creed. 'The third day he rose again from the dead', but we interpret that to mean, 'The third day he did not rise again from the dead'."

In the presence of this modern business of interpreting perfectly plain assertions to mean their exact opposite, do you know what I verily believe? I verily believe that the new Reformation, for which we long, will be like the Reformation of the sixteenth century in that it will mean a return to plain common honesty and common sense. At the end of the middle ages the Bible had become a book with seven seals; it had been covered with the rubbish of the four-fold sense of Scripture and all that. The Reformation brushed that rubbish away. So again today the Bible has been covered with an elaborate business of "interpretation" that is worse in some respects than anything that the middle ages could produce. The new Reformation will brush all that away. There will be a re-discovery of the great Reformation doctrine of the perspicuity of Scripture; men will make the astonishing discovery that the Bible is a plain book addressed to plain men, and that it means exactly what it says.

In our work in exegesis at Westminster Seminary, at any rate, we shall seek to cultivate common sense. But common sense is not so common as is sometimes supposed, and for the cultivation of it true learning is not out of place. What a world of vagaries, what a sad waste of time, could be avoided if men would come into contact with the truly fine exegetical tradition of the Christian church! Such contact with the devout and learned minds of the past would not discourage freshness or originality. Far from it; it would help to shake us out of a rut and lead us into fields of fruitful thinking.

In true Biblical exegesis, the Bible must be taken as God has been pleased to give it to the church. And as God has been pleased to give it to the church, it is not a mere text-book of religion written all at one time and in one way. On the contrary, it is composed of sixty-six books written at widely different times and by the instrumentality of widely different men. Let us not regret that fact. If the Bible were a systematic text-book on religion, it would, indeed, possess some advantages; it would presumably be easier to interpret; for much of our present difficulty of interpretation comes from the fact that the Biblical books are rooted in historical conditions long gone by. But if the Bible, under those circumstances, would be easier to interpret, it would speak far less powerfully to the heart of man. As it is, God has been very good. He has given us no cold text-book on religion, but a Book that reaches every heart and answers to every need. He has condescended to touch our hearts and arouse our minds by the wonderful variety and beauty of His Book.

When we have learned to read that Book aright, we can trace the history of the revelation that it sets forth. When we do so, we are engaging in an important part of the theological curriculum. "Biblical theology", it is called. Whether it is set forth in a separate course, or whether it is interwoven, as will probably be done in Westminster Seminary, with the work of the Old and New Testament departments, in either case it is a vital part of that which we have to deal. "God, who at sundry times and in divers manners spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken unto us by His Son"—there is the program of Biblical theology; it traces the history of revelation through Old and New Testament times.

"I WENT TO ARABIA AND RETURNED TO DAMASCUS"

Galatians 1:17.

By Captain B. F. Mountford

(Notes of an Address given by the Secretary of the Church Army in the United States of America, at a Devotional Service of the Synod and the Woman's Auxiliary of the Province of Sewanee, November 5, 1929.)

WE live in a great day and in probably the best age that ever was. Life is good and has so much to offer. "Come to the fountain," is the constant call. "Yea, come, receive the good things of life, almost without money and without price."

Literature, Poetry, Art, Travel—Scientific Inventions, Labor-saving devices—are all ours. Our lives ought to be rich. Our minds ought to be well stored and our homes perfect heavens. Bnt, somehow, they are uot—always.

So packed with activity and hustle are our waking periods that only for an hour or two each day can we be ourselves to any depth or fulness. Thus this so-great day in which we find ourselves, is also an age packed with danger. Home has less privacy than formerly. The telephone is imperious in its calls, and some neighbors do not knock any more, but troop into the house at will.

Locomotion is constantly being speeded up and we can now be transported across the continent by air-rail combination in fifty hours. Two nights in the train and two days in the air, is enough to convey us from New York City to Los Angeles.

A century ago, William Wordsworth wrote:

> The world is too much with us; late and soon,
> Getting and spending, we lay waste our powers;
> Little we see in Nature that is ours;
> We have given our hearts away, a sordid boon!

"I went into Arabia and returned to Damascus."

Saul of Tarsus had had a great shake-up out on Damascus Road, but he went "not to Jerusalem", but to the desert.

The part played by the desert in the Religion of the Bible, is most marked alike in the Old Testament and in the New. Moses received his call to the leadership of Israel when leading his flocks "in the back of the desert". Elijah was recreated in his faith and courage, and recommissioned for Service, when he had fled to the desert.

John the Baptist was preeminently a Son of the desert; and the Captain of our Salvation began by being "led of the Spirit in the wilderness forty days".

"I went into Arabia and returned to Damascus."

Arabia, speaks of Equipment and Spiritual Preparation. Damascus symbolizes the Field of Service, which is the goal of it all, and there is inferred the mutual relations of Meditation and Ministry, of Seclusion and Service. Every Damascus must have its Arabia, and every Arabia its Damascus. These two are complementary. Each is necessary.

It became a habit of Jesus to find an Arabia. E. G. S. John 10:40. "Jesus went back beyond Jordan —alone—and there He stayed." Back to the spot where He had dedicated Himself, and there girded Himself anew for a yet more difficult path soon to be trodden.

And as Calvary drew nearer, St. Mark records, "Every evening He went out of the City" (11:19, R. V.), went to the house of some friends in Bethany and there found recovery.

He overcame the menace of the City by getting nearer to some human hearts and by quiet fellowship with His Father.

The tendency of the day of hustle is to de-spiritualize us, even whilst we are about our Father's business.

Our soul may have been first awakened through some fellowship and will wish to express itself, as a rule, in corporate acts of devotion, but it is not wholly ours till we have gone out to some Arabia and there, by ourselves, faced the facts.

Solitude is the nurse of full-grown souls.

The Fourth Commandment might be translated, "Once a week thou shalt come out of the City"—only that this Visit to Arabia needs to be taken more frequently even than once a week.

We need to make withdrawal habitual and to put Silence and Prayer and Communion with God, in bigger proportion in the life.

'Tis good to have a regular place in Church; a Special Room in the House, and a Corner in that Room, where we can retire.

Of William Law it was said that he had a spot in his bedroom, and another in his study for SECRET PRAYER. He never allowed himself to do anything common on that spot; and he came to find that just to kneel there was a real and sure assistance towards a spirit of prayer.

Jesus said, "Enter into thine inner-chamber, and when thou hast shut the door, pray to thy Father, who is in secret."

Many today have lost the sense of God's Presence, just because they are never quiet.

We need Arabia, and need to guide our young folks there, too. The mass meeting and public assembly have their unquestioned value in the quickening of allegiance, but when the claims of conscience and the demands of duty have to be thought out, fought out, prayed out, it is solitude that must be sought. "Be still and know . . ." There is a connection between Stillness and Knowledge, and the Spirit of Jesus was repeating in the ear of Saul, away in Arabia, "Be still, and know that I AM GOD"—and Saul was arguing to himself—"If Jesus of Nazareth is all I have said He is not, then I have to reconsider every single opinion and estimate formed, and reconstruct everything from the beginning."

Only in Arabia or some other lonely spot could that be done.

With the present menace of Humanism, we greatly need to think out again the very things Paul had to be sure of.

From thinking of Jesus as an Imposter, he came to recognize Him as Messiah, and something more.

"Who art Thou, Lord?" "Jesus of Nazareth." After his conversion his thought of Christ was always very high, but he plods on in his exploration of this Personality.

"That I might KNOW HIM." From Arabia until his being ready to be offered, he is progressing in knowledge and understanding of the Christ.

Thus, in his earliest Epistle—First Thessalonians—he brackets Christ with God, writing to "the Church of the Thessalonians in God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ."

Later, in Second Corinthians he uses the familiar devotional formula, "the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ and the love of God and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost"—an utterance clearly showing that for him, Jesus had the value of God.

At the end of his life, when he was in prison in Rome, he wrote to the Colossians and there gives to Jesus the highest possible place, attributing to Him a world-significance, identifying Him with the Creative Principle of the Universe and speaking of Him as "the Image of the Invisible God." See Colossians 1:15-18.

How came the ex-persecutor to reach this lofty conception of Jesus, and that, within thirty years of the crucifixion of Jesus?

The fact of the Resurrection does not entirely account for it. Surely, what accounts for it all is Christian Experience, experience of Christ's power, the realization that though He was physically absent, He was spiritually present.

In Arabia and in the years which followed, Paul became aware that Jesus was still present in Christians, and that from Him streamed out life-giving and regenerating forces, which transformed them.

When Paul comes to preach and to write, it is a Message of a Christ who is alive, and through His Spirit working in men's hearts to change them.

Jesus Alive! became the dominating certainty of his life. As he grows in his knowledge of Christ and as his experience deepened, so did his estimate of Christ expand. Until at last, in the Colossian letter, he says that Christ is the Creative Principle of the Godhead.

Today, men are asking, "Who is this Jesus?" We shall presently be called upon seriously to combat Humanistic teaching, as it affects the coming generation, and we elders need to be sure of our ground.

In seeking to decide who Jesus was, we are confronted, not only with the marvellous Figure of the first three Gospels, not only with St. Paul's lofty Christology, and with the general Estimate of New Testament writers, but also with nearly two thousand years of Christian experience.

We cannot really begin to define Christ, until we have taken into consideration the work of Christ, what He has done and is doing by way of redeeming men. Part of our material for answering these questions about Christ is found in that experience of ours which came to us of His help in our hour of sorrow and temptation, or of His forgiveness when we humbly took our failure to Him and He enabled us to make a new start.

Christianity is a life, and a life sustained by Another; a life which finds its springs in Jesus, risen, ascended and present now as spiritual power.

St. Paul found it to be that, and the only reasonable explanation he could give of the fact was to put Jesus Christ into the Godhead, and see in Him the creative and redeeming life of God at work in the world.

In all this, what do our hearts say? Did Paul estimate Jesus too highly? Do our Creeds?

We say, No, not if we take into account the whole range of Christian experience, which is simply a Commentary on the power of Christ.

The memory of Jesus, of what He was and did, is a constant inspiration, but we cannot explain Christian experience by saying it is the result of a cherished memory.

Jesus is the hope of the future, and that hope is a very precious thing, but that won't account for Christian experience. Sinners are not made saints by hope. Jesus as a present Source of life and power—the maker of character the Friend here and now of sad and heavy ladened —the pardoner and encourager, the Fount of Creative Energy. THAT is OUR CHRIST. That is the only adequate explanation of Paul's experience, and of all the centuries of Christian experience, our own included.

Memory, Hope, Power, Jesus is all these, but He is remembered most vividly because He is power, and He is the hope of humanity because of what He has already done on Calvary and since.

Men need to take time to be holy; need to be STILL and KNOW—

Paul went into Arabia that he might apprehend Him. It is the certainty of the things learned in Arabia that later sent him back to Damascus and to subsequent missionary service.

These, too, are our steps. Quietness, Retreat, Prayer, Pondering, Meditation. Be still and know, that I, Jesus, am God—and then—"Woe is me if I preach not the Gospel —the love of the present living Christ constrains me!"

BIBLE QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

(Our readers are invited to send in their questions from time to time concerning Scriptural subjects in which they are perplexed or desire light. Our limited space necessitates brevity in questions, as well as in the answers which we will endeavor to maintain in strict accord with the Word of the Lord, which, after all, settles all argument. This column is therefore not for controversy, but for a testimony.)

Question No. 7.—"Are there any other instances recorded in the Bible, where aged persons were accorded the advantages of youth; as for example, Sara and Elizabeth, the mothers of Isaac and John the Baptist, respectively?"—B. L. T.

Answer.—As the above acts of God carry great significance, permit us to refer to these miracles as overcoming natural "barrenness". All children of barren women represented to Israel true children of God, viz.: Regenerated; a type of our new birth and of the Virgin Birth of Christ. Rachel and Hannah were also barren, and when God gave them children He was showing them He was the God of "Resurrection" and, therefore, of "Redemption" and "Regeneration" through Christ and the Holy Spirit, and the Word of God.

Question No. 8.—"As I read my Bible it would seem there are to be different Judgment scenes, instead of one general Judgment for all. Can you enlighten me on this?"

Answer.—Yes; the Word of God reveals five different Judgments at least, viz.: (1) Concerning "believers" only, as to sin. Time A. D. 30; Place Calvary; Result, release from penalty for sin. See Gal. 3:13; Rom. 8:1, etc. (2) Concerning the "believers" walk. Time, while in the flesh. Place, anywhere. Result, constant cleansing (1 John 1: 9,10). (3) Concerning "believers" works. Time, when our Lord calls His Church to meet Him. Time, unknown. Place, in the air. Result, "Rewards or loss" (Rev. 22:12). (4) Concerning the nations and the Jews. Time, after the rupture of the Church (Matt. 25:31, 32). (5) Concerning the unsaved, or "wicked dead". Time, one thousand years after the Resurrection of the saved. Place, before the great white throne. Result, "Cast into the lake of fire" (Rev. 20:11-15).

How wonderful is the wisdom of our God, in all His plans and purposes.

A Message to the Church

Authorized by the House of Bishops.

Your House of Bishops, met to choose a leader for the Church in the place of our late beloved Presiding Bishop, felicitates the Church on the happy choice which has been made in the person of the Bishop of Chicago, whose vision, inspiration, and tested powers of leadership will guide us through the remainder of this Triennium.

We send you a message of assurance and encouragement. The sudden passing of our former Presiding Bishop at the time when he had entered so fully into the confidence of the Church by his conduct in that office, the drastic cut in missionary expenditure because the plans for this work are strictly limited to the promises of payment for its support, and more recently, the sudden change in values in large areas of the industrial and business world with the far-reaching effects of such a disturbance, combine to confront the Church with a new and unexpected situation. This culminates at the season when efforts to make good the promises of the present year, and plans to secure support for next year, are in full operation.

Your House of Bishops has full confidence in the ability of the Church to meet this situation successfully—but the seriousness of it must be faced squarely.

Let hesitation be swallowed up in renewed courage, and let uncertainty vanish before a confident faith. Adequate support for the work of Christ through His Church does not depend upon material prosperity, nor upon gifts which flow from a surplus after our own needs and requirements are fully met. That view of the situation misses entirely the call of Christ to exercise real sacrifice.

This is the time for us to go forward. On the authority of General Convention plans for such an advance were carefully formulated. There is no reason to change them, even if we had the authority to do so. Difficulties only challenge Christian determination.

Our message might be summed up in that command given to Moses when the people hesitated: "Speak unto the Children of Israel that they go forward!"

The Presiding Bishop will doubtless have his own message for the Church. The House of Bishops uses this occasion to bespeak for our chosen leader the help which he must have from us all as he accepts at our hands the responsibilities of his office—our prayers, our unstinted loyalty, our generous sacrifices for the work of the Kingdom of Christ.

FAVORITE SCRIPTURE VERSE.

(In this space each week will appear a favorite passage of Scripture as sent in by a different reader. Every one is, therefore, invited to send us their favorite verse. It is suggested all who can, join with the rest of us in committing to memory the verse which appears here each week, including its location in the Holy Book; and in due time your memory chest will be laden with choice, eternal treasures, indeed. "Thy word have I hid in my heart, that I might not sin against thee." Ps. 119:11.)

This week the following verse was submitted by

Mrs. George C. Remey, of Jamestown, Rhode Island:

> "For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life."
> —St. John 3:16.

Book Reviews

THE BOYHOODS OF THE PRESIDENTS: By Bessie White Smith. Published by Lothrop, Lee and Shepard Company, Boston.

The author of this handsome and entertaining volume, illustrated by more than sixty-four page pictures of the homes, birthplaces and portraits of the Presidents of the United States, is Mrs. Cadwallader Smith, of Richmond, Va., a former teacher in St. Andrew's School and an active worker in one of our churches.

The book has a well conceived plan, ably carried out, for the instruction of boys and girls of school age and to afford pleasant reading for "grown ups". This writer, picking it up to review, intended only to sample it here and there, but ended by reading it all. A stronger incentive to read the history of their own country and government could hardly be found for our young people. The romantic and delightful stories of the early lives of boys who rose to the highest political position in the gift of a great modern nation and world power possess a fascination that no fiction can supply.

The first was a "boy-general", who was born in Westmoreland County Virginia, and lived afterwards in a lovely home on the Potomac River below Alexandria. "He was a quaint little boy, skillful, amiable, prudent and wise."

He did not like personal fighting, but he was a born soldier and leader, and drilled his schoolmates in military tactics. In commanding, running and jumping he excelled them all.

Then there was the "Boy who had no Boyhood", and "Long Tom", and "The Little Sage". Then came the "Stamp Act Boy," and the "Little Post Rider", and "Old Hickory".

There was the "Boy-Lawyer", and the "Boy who cried for the Moon." Another boy became "Rough and Ready" and the next boy was born right at the beginning of the new century.

After a while came a "Boy who split Rails"; then the "Tailor Boy" and "Uncle Sam". There was the "Cob House Boy" and a "Green Mountain Boy" and a very "Stubborn Boy" and "Towhead."

Coming down nearer to us was "Teddy," "The Boy of the Ready Smile," "The Seer," "Doc," and "Cal," and last of all, "The Master of Emergencies."

Space in this review does not permit the recital of even a few of the many stories of the boy life of the men who became, in one way or another, world figures at the head of the most powerful young nation in the world. The book should prove an inspiration to every boy and girl to study and strive to achieve the highest place in the life to which it has pleased God to call them.

For a Christmas present no father, mother or friend can make a mistake in presenting this book to their young people. For such a handsome volume the price of $2.50 is reasonable. Semmes.

THE REAL JESUS: By Bishop Charles Fiske and Professor Burton Easton. Cloth. Pp. 261. Published by Harper Brothers, New York City. Price, $2.50.

To the superficially-minded the caption of this book would seem to indicate bumptiousness on the part of the authors. What have they discovered that would entitle them to assume such superiority? Let us be charitable and allow that one is driven hard to find any title for a life of our Lord (which this book aims to be), in these days of multiplicity of designations for this constantly presented theme.

We may trust Bishop Fiske to be true to the faith; and Professor Easton cordially sympathetic with his episcopal brother. So that at once, the appeal in the book is heightened. The very opening chapter wins us to the discussion. There are the words: "To the devout believer, Jesus gives the whole universe its meaning; He is a figure not only of the past, but of the continual present, ever living, ever able and ready to enter into supremely intimate relations with those who believe in Him and trust Him. But even apart from such faith, interest in Jesus never flags. He is incomparably the most significant figure in history."

Our thoughts trace with the authors, as we read the book, the foundations upon which the mission of our Lord was built. The challenging interrogation, "Who do you say that I am?" is the core of the inquiry. Simon Peter's answer is the universal response to the appeal. He can be nothing to us if He is not the Son of God. Deal as we may and must with the purely human side of that matchless life, there is the insistent urge to find Him something more than a good man, a wise teacher, a faithful friend, a devout religionist. And we may not forget that it was in connection with that confession, which is ours to make, that the Cross loomed upon the horizon as the means by which that claim to Deity should be established. In these days of the popular trend to humanize Jesus to the exclusion of that other part of Himself and His mission which the Gospels so insistently demand, it is refreshing to get this message before the people.

To charge that the deification of Jesus was accomplished long after His death, by enthusiasts intoxicated by a glamorous fantasy, is to credit to human invention a feat of which it is not capable. As. Dr. Orchard has recently said: "If the idea of God is to be explained away as a false analogy, a mistaken transprojection of the egoistic impulse, or an invention of an emotional desire, then sooner or later it must dawn upon even the moderately thoughtful or the most muddled thinker that the rationality of the human mind has been seriously undermined." This criterion holds most surely with the question of the reality of our Lord's assumption of equality with God. He must be all that is claimed for Him by those who arrogate to themselves the authority to write of Him in the primal instance, or the entire fabric of His life and mission falls into helpless chaos.

As one traces with these learned authors the pathway of truth concerning that matchless life, the conviction becomes strengthened that He is not only completely human in His identification with us of the flesh life, but is, according to the Apostle (1 Tim. 6:15), "The blessed and only Potentate, the King of kings and Lord of lords."

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letters to the Editor" will appear in our columns except those coming to us signed by writer.

A SUGGESTION.

Mr. Editor:

Mr. Franklin, Vice-President of the National Council has circularized the Church with pitiful tales or work for which a committee of "four laymen and one bishop" could find "no room" in the budget. The material first appeared, I believe, in your columns.

The purpose is to promote larger giving. And it would, I am certain, be far more effective in accomplishing that purpose, if it were first evident that drastic reductions had been made in appropriations for traveling, publicity and other departmental costs. Whatever may be said as to the value of these items, no thoughtful Christian considers them of importance compared with the cases cited by Mr. Franklin.

May I call attention to the final address of the late Presiding Bishop, as reported in the Church press? He is represented as saying that Church people are giving more generously than ever before, and to have expressed concern over the "ever increasing proportion spent for dioecsan purposes."

Under plans sponsored by the National Council and ceaselessly pressed forward by Missions House spokesmen, the expenses of this diocese alone have increased at an appalling rate—over $21,000; in seven years, $8,000 in the current year. Quotas of parishes that have grown neither in numbers nor resources have been more than doubled, that we might adopt the departmental and secretarial program. Many other dioceses have been constrained to like development. A considerable amount of this is not vital and it diverts a large part of the flowing stream of contributions before it reaches the national treasury. Indeed, dissatisfaction with this diocesan program sometimes dries up the springs. As an illustration consider the words of a layman who writes: "There is a growing feeling that our missionary funds are not going where we mean them to go. The vestry has instructed the treasurer to send no payments to the diocese without instructions."

Let the national officers address themselves to the task of reducing diocesan overhead, which the National Council has fostered without intimate knowledge of local conditions, and of which its president seems to have disapproved, and, without laying greater burdens upon hard pressed parishes and worried priests, funds will be adequate to take care of some of his published problems without "breaking hearts".

A similar reduction of national expenditure would assure our missionaries of continuous salaries, and encourage the clergy to take up such work, instead of "digging in" as rectors of parishes, where they have security of salary and tenure.

"EASIER TO STAND."

Mr. Editor:

This morning when I visited a negro school in the county I spoke to over three hundred negro boys and girls, who stood throughout a program which lasted nearly an hour, including my own fifteen-minute contribution. Why did the entire student body stand? Because it was easier to stand than to sit. And it was easier, because there were no seats in the chapel, and sitting on the floor is too oriental to be comfortably achieved.

Touched by an experience which was unique to me, and sensing the evidently fine atmosphere and standard of the school, I promised the students that I would "see what I could do". This is my method of ascertaining! Should this come to the attention of any who are interested in the Negro and who would consider this a worthy appeal, the undersigned would gladly receive a check for three hundred substantial seats—or for a portion of that number.

It is significant that a group of about fifty of these boys and girls, in chorus, sang a beautiful setting of the Master's words, "Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find." Let's prove it!

CONFERENCE FOR COLLEGE STUDENTS.

Mr. Editor:

The vital problem before the Church today is to discover able and devoted men in our colleges who might be persuaded to give their lives to the Christian Ministry. There are many who might come if we could invite them and explain to them its requirements, its privileges, and its joys. When the great professions of medicine and the law are seeking only men with full intellectual qualifications, the Church must not lag behind, but must insist that all candidates for the ministry shall put the same high demand upon their qualifications, and be willing to undertake full college training, as well as the spiritual and professional training of the theological seminary.

All who feel this responsibility have the opportunity to send young collegians whom they may know to the Conference on the Ministry, which is to be held at St. Paul's School, Concord, New Hampshire, in January, 1930, from the third to the sixth.

Among those who will speak at this Conference are Dr. Grenfell, Dr. Drury, the Rev. Henry Hobson, Bishop Dallas, Mr. A. Herbert Gray, Dr. Ogilby, Mr. Felix Du Pont, Dean Sturges, Mr. Coleman Jennings, Mr. Harper Sibley, the Rev. C. Leslie Glenn, and the Rev. Dr. Frederick H. Sill.

No man pledges himself to enter the ministry by going to the conference. The conference is simply a place where men may discover what the ministry is, and, even if they do not respond to the call, they will have a vision of what the ministry should be.

Church Intelligence

G. F. S. Offers New Service.

A valuable new service which The Girls' Friendly Society offers to clergy is the making of surveys of young people's work in a parish with a view to determining whether a branch of the society is needed or not. The field secretaries, at their conference in September, studied the best methods of making such a survey. At the clergy conference, Roanoke, Va., Miss Esther Fifield, Field Secretary for Province III described these surveys. As a result, Miss Fifield has been requested to visit several parishes to survey the situation in regard to girls' work and to determine whether or not an organization such as The Girls' Friendly Society is needed.

Missionary Giving Shows Decrease.

It is good to be able to report a better situation with regard to collections on the budget quotas of the current year as during the month of October we made up $55,500 of the decrease from last year's receipts. There is still more ground to be gained in the last two months as the receipts for the year to November 1 show a decrease as compared with last year of $82,242. As the dioceses have told the National Council to expect slightly more in 1929 than in 1928, the task of collection for the remaining two months is a bit heavier than it was last year.

Only thirteen dioceses and districts are now in the one hundred per cent class as compared with sixteen in 1928 and twenty in 1927. The most serious feature of the situation is that instead of a constant growth in missionary giving, there has been for the past three years a recession from the record mark reached in 1926. As a result the work is suffering. The natural result of life is growth. The Church's Mission is a living thing, a successful enterprise, and with life comes growth and with success ought to come expansion. Life can be killed by stopping growth and success can be turned into failure by a refusal to permit natural expansion.

The remedy for the situation is threefold: First the payment of all that has been pledged for 1929; second, a pledge for 1930, equal to the full budget quota of every parish and of every diocese; third, the adoption by the General Convention of 1931 of a budget sufficiently large to permit of seizing opportunities for new work now being passed by.

We should ask ourselves not only "How much is our quota?" but also "How much does the Church need to do its work efficiently, and how much of that can I give?"

Golden Jubilee of Armenian Patriarch Celebrated.

On the afternoon of Sunday, November 10, there was a meeting in New York, the climax of the celebration of the Golden Jubilee of Tourian, Armenian Patriarch of Jerusalem The Armenians have been celebrating this all over the world for Tourian is respected and beloved of all Armenians. The meeting in New York was in the Metropolitan Life Auditorium. It consisted of speeches, music, the reading of a poem of the Patriarch, and a speech by Dr. Thomas Burgess, officer of the National Council, officially representing the Assessor to the Presiding Bishop and the Bishop of New York. He read messages from both. Bishop Burleson wrote as follows:

"Were Bishop Murray still alive, he would rejoice in extending his heartiest congratulations and offering earnest prayers for God's blessing on his Beatitude, the Armenian Patriarch of Jerusalem and his great Church and people.

Our common faith has been glorified by the steadfastness which the Armenian people has shown amid dire persecutions. Jerusalem, the Holy City, is now a center for the training of future leaders of the Armenian Church and nation, whose honored and beloved Patriarch will play a vital part in the preservation of its national life and culture.

As a sister church, long in close sympathy with the Apostolic Church of Armenia, the Episcopal Church rejoices in the celebration of this Golden Jubilee. May the blessing of God rest upon the Armenian people and their ancient Church."

The Armenian Patriarch of Jerusalem was ordained to the priesthood fifty years ago. He was the son of a blacksmith. His elder brother was one of the foremost modern poets of Armenia. The Patriarch himself is a poet of high standing and probably the greatest figure in the Armenian Church of today. He personally heads the Theological Seminary at which our Educational Chaplain, the Rev. C. Thorley Bridgeman, teaches, and which is housed in the famous Monastery of St. James on Mount Zion. Because of Chaplain Bridgeman's important work there our Church is intimately connected with the Patriarch in training the future leaders of the Armenian race.

The Golden Jubilee Fund to which Armenians are contributing is for the publication of Armenian literature, including some of the later works by Patriach Tourian. A wealthy Armenian in London, Mr. Gulbenkian, cousin of the great Armenian merchant in New York of the same name, who is supporting the Senior Class at the Seminary in Jerusalem, has contributed as his Golden Jubilee gift the entire funds for a building in which will be housed the Library on Mount Zion, which includes priceless Armenian manuscripts.

Church Students.

Many clergy in college towns are clamoring to have the parents and home rectors of college students inform them of Church students in college. If some college boy or girl slips away from contact with the Church this year, it may possibly be your fault for not putting the college rector in touch.

Virginia Baptist Reports.

At the one hundred and sixth annual session of the Virginia Baptist General Association, opened at Winchester, November 13, the report of Treasurer Frank Crump, Richmond, showed $3,429,000 contributed for all church purposes in the fiscal year just ended. The association has 1,166 churches, 705 ordained ministers. More than 900 delegates to the meeting were registered. The Rev. W. F. Gibson, Richmond, preached the annual sermon. The address of welcome was by Governor Harry Flood Byrd and the response by Governor-elect Pollard. Never before in its history had an association meeting been addressed by both governor and prospective governor.

College of Preachers Dedicated.

The College of Preachers of Washington Cathedral, America's newest religious institution, was formally dedicated on November 14, the day following the meeting of the House of Bishops in Bethlehem Chapel for the election of a Presiding Bishop. The Rt. Rev. Frank Theodore Woods, Bishop of Winchester, England, members of the House of Bishops and clergymen from all parts of the country, participated in the service, of which one feature was a procession through the entire building, with hymn singing by the clergy.

The building which the College of Preachers will occupy is the gift of the late Alexander Smith Cochran, Yonkers, N. Y., manufacturer and philanthropist, who also provided for the financial support of the institution's activities. A little over two years ago Mr. Cochran gave $250,000 for the building as a memorial to his mother, the late Mrs. William F. Cochran. He later increased this by a gift of $150,000 for the construction of the College of Preachers' Chapel, for furnishings of the building and for the landscaping of the adjacent grounds. In addition, he provided $1,000,000 by bequest to be used as an endowment.

The inception of this unique institution, believed to be the first of its nature in Christian history, is traced to the late Rt. Rev. Henry Yates Satterlee, first Bishop of Washington, who suggested more than three decades ago that a school of the prophets be founded in connection with the Cathedral in the National Capital to translate the doctrinal truths of theology "into the common language of life in such a way as to take hold of the living convictions of thinking men".

Bishop Freeman, who has been active in bringing this dream to fruition, regards the establishment of the College of Preachers as a step toward a Nation-wide revival of Christianity through the power of preaching. A group of eminent theologians and leading exponents of the art of preaching have met for a three-day conference following the dedication for the purpose of considering the curriculum for the initial session. The Rt. Rev. Philip M. Rhinelander, warden of the College of Preachers and former Bishop of Pennsylvania, presided at this latter gathering. Bishop Rhinelander, as a trustee of the Cathedral, has been associated with the College of Preachers in its tentative work during the last five years in advance of its new building and endowment.

Warning.

The public is hereby warned against a Mr. William Mitchell (no kin of mine that I know of), a Canadian by birth, about fifty years old, squat, florid (very ruddy); hair scanty, dark, streaked with grey; wears shell spectacles; protruding under lip, lips large, red, moist; with some bronchial trouble, shown by shortness of breath; very convincing talker; sold musical instruments here and victimized one of our congregations in the sale to them of an organ; had a Willys Knight sedan car, when he left these parts, but does not drive it—his wife does that. Has a letter of commendation from me, which, of course, is to be disregarded.

Sincerely,
Walter Mitchell.

Clergy, Beware!

Mr. Editor:

Please advise the clergy of our Church to beware of a man using the name, H. E. Wright. He is an imposter. He is a well-dressed man, wears heavy rimmed glasses, claims to be a world-war Major, is about six feet tall, about forty-three years of age, and weighs about two hundred pounds. He poses as a salesman who has lost his money. I am,

Sincerely yours,

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., Bishop

Lord Bishop of Winchester Preaches Here.

A sermon of rare strength and force was heard Sunday afternoon, November 17, in Bethlehem Chapel, Washington Cathedral, and elsewhere, by radio, when the preacher was the Rt. Rev. F. T. Woods, D. D., Lord Bishop of Winchester, England. Taking for his subject, "Peace", he presented to the crowded congregation in Bethlehem Chapel an ideal and vision, new in its interpretation and yet simple and old in truth. At the close of his sermon, he referred to Woodrow Wilson (whose remains lie under the crypt chapel), as the man who dared to sound the call for peace, who died, but whose call has been growing increasingly stronger in the years that have followed. At eight P. M., the Bishop was the preacher at the Church of the Epiphany.

The Rt. Rev. Irving Peake Johnson, Bishop of Colorado, who has been in Washington to attend the meeting of the House of Bishops, has been the guest of the Rev. C. Ernest Smith, rector of St. Thomas' Church, and was the preacher there at the eleven o'clock service on November 17. In the afternoon a very special service was held at four o'clock, when children of St. Thomas' Parish and of other Sunday Schools were present. St. Thomas' Chapter of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew invited the children of the Episcopal Home for Children to attend, providing a bus for their transportation and light refreshments for them in the parish hall after service. At both services, Bishop Johnson stressed Church Extension in connection with the Every Member Canvass, which begins December 1.

The Rev. Z. B. Phillips, D. D., rector of the Church of the Epiphany, was heard over radio Sunday morning at his eleven o'clock services.

The Sunday School Institute of the Diocese of Washington held its monthly meeting in St. John's Parish Hall on Tuesday evening, November 19, at 8 P. M.

Reports of summer schools and conferences were made by those who attended these schools during the past summer. This institute is open to all persons interested, especially those who are Sunday-school workers.

Twenty-Fifth Anniversary: The twenty-fifth anniversary of the rectorship of the Rev. C. Ernest Smith, of St. Thomas' Church, Washington, was celebrated Sunday, November 3. The first service in the church was in 1899, the Rev. John J. Aspinwall being then rector. In the last twenty-seven years the congregation has contributed more than a million dollars, of which $200,000 was spent in paying balance on the church building, providing a rectory and erecting St. Thomas' Hall and $100,000 has been invested in an endowment fund. A new organ, to cost $10,000, has been given by Mrs. E. Gray Pendleton, of the parish, in memory of her son, Edward Barton Pendleton, who died in the World War.

Bishop of Liberia: Bishop Robert Erskine Campbell, missionary bishop of Liberia, Negro republic on the West Coast of Africa, addressed the Woman's Auxiliary of the Diocese of Washington, D. C., in Epiphany Church the morning of November 12. The Bishop gave deeply interesting descriptions of his work and travels in a country without railroads and with few roads for vehicles and where journeys must be by canoe on streams or in palanquins over narrow trails through jungle.

Wonderful Window in the Cathedral: The first window recently placed in the Cathedral at Washington consists of 2,300 pieces of stained glass and weighs more than 1,000 pounds. Its picture is of the seven parables of the Kingdom, and it was prepared especially for the Cathedral by Lawrence B. Saint, leading authority on medieval stained glass. The mortar holding the window in place, in addition to iron rods fixed in surrounding masonry, is the same used in medieval workmanship, consisting of cow hair, lime and sand.

Brotherhood of St. Andrew Forms Plans.

Rectors of twenty-two parishes in and near this city attended luncheon November 15, at the University Club as the guests of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew to hear the Rev. Earl Kernahan explain the plan for a religious census and for visitation evangelism to be conducted here in February and March, 1930. Practically all the Episcopal parishes are expected to cooperate.

Mr. Kernahan has just closed a very successful effort in Alexandria, Virginia, and V. Ward Boswell of Christ Church Chapter, Alexandria, spoke of the remarkable results secured. Canon Peter, of the Cathedral, told of work of a similar character, carried out in the neighborhood of his former parish, St. James, Richmond, Virginia, and heartily endorsed the project.

SOUTHWESTERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. Robert C. Jett. D. D., Bishop

Echoes of the Executive Board.

The Executive Board of the Diocese of Southwestern Virginia had an interesting session in Roanoke on Thursday, November 14. The Rt. Rev. Robert Carter Jett, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese, presided.

The Rev. E. Edwin Michael, of Roanoke, reported that the Field Department, of which he is Chairman, is progressing nicely with its preparation for the Every Member Canvass. The canvass in this diocese will begin Sunday, December 1. In accordance with a plan adopted this year for the first time, representatives of the Executive Board have visited about thirty of the larger churches in the diocese during October and November, conferring with the vestries and in some cases addressing the congregations.

The Rev. Alfred R. Berkeley, of Roanoke, as Chairman of the Department of Religious Education, announced the appointment of Mr. John M. Garrison as Diocesan Director of Religious Education, with his headquarters at Roanoke. On November 4, Mr. Garrison assumed the duties of this office, in which he serves under the direction of the Department. A native of South Carolina, Mr. Garrison had special training in the School of Religious Education and Social Service of Boston University and two years of study at the Boston School for Social Workers. He has been engaged in work of this character for the past six years in connection with St. Michael's Church at Marblehead, Massachusetts; Trinity Cathedral at Phoenix, Arizona, and St. Paul's Cathedral, at Detroit, Michigan. In conjunction with the clergy at Lynchburg, Mr. Garrison is planning two teacher training institutes to be held there in the near future. These will deal primarily with Church School work, and the development of organizations for young people. He is also getting in touch with other rectors in the diocese with a view to giving them such assistance as he may in his new position. Mr. Garrison's address is Box 1068, Roanoke, Va.

Mr. Berkeley also described to the Board a meeting held in Richmond November 7, of the Executive Committee of the Virginia Summer Conference of Religious Education. It is planned that this conference will be held at Sweet Briar College, June 16-27. The Rev. Herbert S. Osburn, of Tappahannock, Virginia, will be President of the Conference, and the Rev. Edwin R. Carter, D. D., of Petersburg, will be Dean of the faculty. The work among the younger members of the conference will be conducted as a special division under a "Youth Committee" composed of the Rev. Messrs. A. R. Berkeley and D. L Gwathmey.

The Bishop announced the recent appointment of Miss Emma Margaret Farish as missionary in charge at Grace House on the Mountain, near St. Paul, in Wise County, and Miss Brightside Webb Savage in the same position at Christ Mission in Amherst County

He also announced that the Rev. William Clarkson Marshall, for the past six years rector of Zion Church at Fairfax, Virginia, and the nearby churches at Vienna and Burke, has accepted a call to the rectorship of St. John's Church at Bedford, in this diocese, and expects to take charge there December 1. He will also have under his care St. Thomas' Church, near Big Island, and St. Mark's at Montvale. Mr. Marshall was born in Accomac County, Virginia, and is a graduate of the University of Virginia, and Virginia Seminary. He was ordained to the diaconate in 1915 and to the priesthood in 1916 and, before going to Fairfax in 1923, he had served parishes in Fauquier and Culpeper Counties, Virginia. Mrs. Marshall was formerly Miss Lydia Wistar Craighill, of Lynchburg, and is a sister of the Rev. George Peyton Craighill, of Leesburg, Virginia, and the Rev. Lloyd R. Craighill, who since 1918 has served as missionary at Nanchang, China.

The Executive Board of the Diocese meets in the parish house of St. John's Church, Roanoke, on the second Thursday in each month, unless for special reasons the date is changed by the Bishop.

KENTUCKY.

Rt. Rev. C. E. Woodcock, D. D., Bishop

Dedication of Chapel at Grahamton, Meade County.

On Sunday, October 27, the Memorial Chapel, erected by the Girls' Friendly Society in Kentucky to the memory of the late Rev. Arthur E. Gorter, for many years minister-in-charge of Holy Trinity Mission at Grahamton, was dedicated. In the early morning, the Rev. W. F. Rennenberg, now in charge, accompanied by the Bishop, and Miss Henrietta Bullitt, Diocesan President of the G. F. S., with other church members of Louisville, drove thirty miles and arrived in time for the eleven o'clock Morning Service. Though but a few months under construction, the chapel is remarkably complete; and is a most attractive small building. Many memorials have been given, and were dedicated by the Bishop during the two services, morning and afternoon. A silver communion service from the children and grandchildren of Mr. Archibald Magill Robinson, commemorates his memory, as also a mural tablet recalling him as the founder of the mission, and thirty-five years of unceasing lay service begun as early as 1868. Another tablet, from the family of the Rev. A. E. Gorter, perpetuates his faithful labors, while many other gifts tell of loved ones gone, and beautify the altar, sanctuary and chancel of this house of God erected to His honor and glory. A small class received Confirmation, and more than fifty knelt at the chancel rail, offering fervent thanks for the gift of this House of Prayer, the fulfillment of long cherished dreams and patient hope. A large congregation assembled for the afternoon service, many added to the number already brought from Louisville, and the chancel was filled with vested clergy. In addition to countless other untiring labors, and rare attention to detail, Mr. Rennenberg had arranged for the transport of the choir and organist from his own parish—the Church of the Redeemer—and very beautiful were the old hymns and anthems rendered. The Rev. H. S. Musson, rector of the Church of the Advent, Louisville, was the preacher for the afternoon, and with impressive adaptation of the name of the mission, delivered a striking sermon on the mystery, yet the Reality, of the blessed Trinity.

Rt. Rev. Jas. R. Winchester, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. E. W. Saphore, D. D., Suffragan.
Rt. Rev. E. T. Demby, D. D., Suffragan.

Bishop Winchester has returned to the diocese after a three months' visit with his daughter in Chicago. The Bishop is in much better physical health, and is gradually regaining his strength. However, he is not yet able to make any visits to the parishes.

Improvements are being made in St. Andrew's, Marianna, where good work is always being done. A parish house is being arranged and rebuilt, so that there will be a meeting place for the working organizations.

In Trinity Cathedral, a Parent-Teachers' Association has been formed so that there may be more interest and a closer relationship between teachers and parents.

In St. John's Church, Camden, October 13, was Home-Coming Day. Unusual congregations were present at all three services. It was the fifth anniversary of the Rev. Randolph R. Claiborne's rectorate. A surprise was sprung, when the Senior Warden asked to be heard, and revealed that there had been a secret meeting of the vestry, at which resolutions of review and appreciation of Mr. Claiborne's service to the parish were passed; and he proceeded to read them to the congregation.

The Secretary of the Diocese has been notified by the vestry of St. John's Church, Fort Smith, that it will be inconvenient for them to have the convention meet there in January; and they request that another place be appointed.

Stir up, we beseech Thee, O Lord, the wills of Thy faithful people, that they, plenteously bringing forth the fruit of good works, may by Thee be plenteously rewarded; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

COLLECT FOR THANKSGIVING DAY.

O Most Merciful Father, Who hast blessed the labors of the husbandman in the returns of the fruits of the earth; we give Thee humble and hearty thanks for this Thy bounty; beseeching Thee to continue Thy loving kindness to us, that our land may still yield her increase to Thy glory and our comfort; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

A PSALM FOR THANKSGIVING DAY.

O Thou whose boundless love bestows
The joy of life, the hope of heaven:
Thou whose unchartered mercy flows
O'er all the blessings Thou hast given;
Thou by whose light alone we see;
Thou by whose truth our souls set free,
Are made imperishably strong;
Hear Thou the solemn music of our song.

Grant us the knowledge that we need
To solve the questions of the mind;
Light thou our candle while we read,
And keep our hearts from going blind:
Enlarge our vision to behold
The wonders Thou hast wrought of old;
Reveal Thyself in every law,
And gild the towers of truth with holy awe.

O God, make us what Thou wilt;
Guide Thou the labor of our hand:
Let all our work be surely built
As Thou, the architect, hast planned;
But whatsoever Thy power shalt make
Of these frail lives, do not forsake
Thy dwelling. Let Thy presence rest
Forever in the Temple of our breast.

Thanksgiving.

Thanksgiving is more an inner state of mind than an outer condition. It is a state of thoughtfulness and appreciation and gratitude for what we have and are, and therefore it depends more on one's mood and temperament, standards and ideals, than on his possessions, less on his position than on his disposition. One may have a wide range and abundance of worldly goods and yet be discontented, and another may have few comforts and be shut in by very narrow circumstances, and yet be strangely contented and thankful. Yet the day was originally appointed with reference to harvests and gradually grew into taking a stock of our goods national and individual, and this is still its dominant note. Which is proper enough as far as it goes, for all good things are of God and it is right that we should appreciate and return thanks to Him "for all His goodness and wonderful works". Yet, if we stop at this point we are only considering the material things of life and may even be playing the part of the fool that resolved to tear down his barns and build bigger that he might feed his soul on corn. A flood of material goods is a danger to our high spiritual life by flushing the flesh with gratifications that are peculiar to it and starving the very soul to death. It is a poor life that sinks and smothers the spirit in the flesh, however broad its acres and large its bank account. Wealth is gained at too great a cost at the expense of wisdom, and a lean, selfish soul in an overfed and lustful body is a sickening sight. As a nation we are in greater danger of this practical materialism than any other people on earth as beyond any other our barns are stuffed to bursting and all our banks are gorged and we pile up statistics of our wealth and prosperity that stagger the rest of the world and even astound us and may fill us with childish glee or with foolish vanity and pride. We are surely given much that we may serve much and be a benefactor to the world in all good things, especially the ministry of good will and in extending, not our power and prestige, but the kingdom of peace on earth and glory to God.—Presbyterian Banner.

In Enforced Idleness.

On the beaches of many of the South Sea Islands a sea creature is brought in by the tide at certain seasons of the year and left stranded in considerable numbers. Before these creatures can flop or waddle into deeper water, the alert natives pounce upon them and, breaking their backs so that, though still living, they are unable to move, they haul them out of the reach of the returning tide, keeping them alive until fresh meat is wanted.

Sometimes when prolonged illness removes a man from his natural environment and leaves him stranded, he feels that, like these unfortunate creatures of the South Seas, he is the victim of a cruel fate. It is not only his helplessness that distresses him, not only the labor and trouble he gives to others, although these results of his illness are serious enough. Financial problems may add to his anxieties, but it is not these anxieties, grievous though they be, which cause his greatest misery. Perhaps he is unhappy from wounded egotism. He felt that the part which he was playing in the life of the community was an important one. But now that he is laid aside, after a brief period of adjustment, all the affairs of consequence in which he was interested move on as though his absence were unnoticed. But his unhappiness may have its roots in nobler soil. It may spring from the unselfish desire to fulfil some worthy mission on earth, that by serving his God and his brother man he may help to ennoble and perfect the structure of humanity. When illness from which it is not likely he shall ever wholly recover, brings his hopes and aspirations crashing about his broken body, his discouraged mind, weary with depressions, echoes the poignant cry of the cross, 'My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken me?" It is not surprising that the uselessness of a life shut apart from all the activity and bustle of the world's program often breaks the most courageous heart and fills the long hours with despondency.

Recently a correspondent of the Canadian Churchman asked that something might be written for the encouragement of men and women whose hopes have tumbled in in this fashion. "Half of my unexpected fifty-five years," he writes, "have been spent in and out of sanatoria, a useless kind of life some would call it, and at first I felt this keenly. Then God sent a prayer ot Phillips Brooks to me and a sentence of that prayer altered my viewpoint to my great peace of mind."

After quoting the whole sentence and underlining the phrase referred to—"But may all that Thou sendest us bring us closer to Thee, that we . . . may be sure . . . that . . . in every enforced idleness Thou art still using us," the writer proceeds. "For height and depth and breadth this prayer ranks among the most beautiful in our language for those in trouble—and how many they are! Every thinking man has his times, I expect. Let me add that my faith has had a thousand proofs and little to tax it, so I am not crying out against life. Far from that. But I see so many who lack what means everything to me when troubles come."

"In every enforced idleness Thou art still using us." God never wills that man should suffer or that evils should come, but God can help us use the suffering and the pain so that not in spite of it but by means of it we gain maturity and enrichment of personality. The natural response to trouble, especially to prolonged and unending trouble, is resentment and bitterness. But to meet trouble in this spirit is to become impoverished in character and personality. When, however, we accept our pain and sorrow in the spirit of one who is not unwilling to bear His share of the world's trouble, we shall find that grief and tragedy will become transformed into messengers of God's grace, and character will be strengthened and ennobled.—Canadian Churchman.

What Were the Methods of Jesus as a Teacher?

Jesus was supremely a teacher and his methods were masterly exhibitions of the true principles of teaching.

Jesus understood the primary art in teaching of adapting his teaching to the mental contents and state of mind of his hearers. He never talked to people about things above their heads and beyond their experience, but fitted his teaching right into their personal knowledge and needs. He never asked them to sit under His teaching in passive unthinking receptivity, so that He could pour His opinions into them, but He stirred up their mental self-activity by appealing to their own intuitions and reasoning and judgment and thus led them to think with Him to a common conclusion. He took them into partnership with Himself in His teaching so that it was a mutual process and its conclusion a join product. Often He would say to them, "What think ye?" or "What man of you?" and thus He submitted the point He was making to their judgment and was willing to leave it with them. Thus He did not override those who were objecting to His teaching with His authority, but patiently reasoned with them, stirred up their own mental processes and worked out conclusions together with them.

The question has ever been the teacher's main tool in probing the minds of his scholars and opening them up to light and knowledge. Socrates, the greatest teacher of Greece, was simply a walking interrogation mark and with its sharp point he punctured many a fallacy or pricked a bubble of conceit.

But Jesus was a greater master still of this art and it was one of His chief means of proving truth and exposing error. He frequently met one question by asking another and thus forced the inquirer to face and answer his own question. He especially used this method in His contests with the Pharisees and scribes who came to Him with cunningly devised traps in which they were themselves ensnared in the unexpected turn he gave to the situation by a counter dilemma. When they came to Him with their catch question about paying taxes to Caesar He caught them with their own coin, and He completely upset them with their question fearfully and wonderfully contrived about the woman who had had seven husbands and then mercifully died herself, by His simple answer, 'You do err, not knowing the Scriptures," and thus floored them out of their own Bible. The people enjoyed these contests of their conceited and pompous doctors of divinity with the young Nazarene. He delighted to play with them and keep them puzzled and wondering what He would do next. His keen rapier was too swift and keen for their antiquated bludgeons. It was generally a sorry day with them when they met Him. Yet Jesus never aimed simply at getting the better of His opponents, personal victory was not His objective, but He used His dialectical skill only as a means of ultimate good.

Jesus was a master of illustration and drew His illustrations from all sources. Especially did He draw them out of His own life and experience running back to His childhood days. He was a keen observer and lover of nature and communed with it and saturated his soul with its mystic beauty and teaching and constantly embroidered His sermons with quotations from sky and earth and sea. So also His knowledge of human nature and life that came out so richly in His illustrations was drawn from His experience and was often the product of the unconscious education He had picked up in the homes and streets of the village. His parables are pictures of the daily experience of His hearers which brought His teachings home to every one's bosom and business. To farmers He spoke of sowing and reaping, of wheat and tares; to fishermen of casting nets and sorting the fish and finding the pearl of great price; to tax gatherers of exacting no more than was due; to soldiers of doing violence to no one. The whole world of nature and of human life was alive to Jesus with illustrations; forest, vine and flower; fishing boat and kitchen utensils, plows and harrows, were eloquent with spiritual truth and glittered with illustrations as the morning grass with dew. It was this art that made His teaching, in contrast with the dull and dreary droning of the scribes and Pharisees, so fresh and interesting so that the common people heard Him gladly.

Jesus was also a master in the invention and use of the parable, which is a picture of the truth, a dramatized expression of doctrine and duty. He was almost the inventor of "the short story", and some of His parables, such as the Prodigal Son and the Good Samaritan, have never been surpassed in this field and form of literature and have passed into the general literature of the world. By this means, also, He was able to veil the truth in a form that was plain enough to those who had affinity and were in sympathy with it and yet did not give alarm and offense to its enemies. He was also master of the paradox, or seemingly contradictory statement, or one that seems to run contrary to common sense. His beatitudes are of this nature and many others of His sayings. The purpose of such speech is not to state a real contradiction or any form of untruth, but to arouse the mind with a sharp sense of surprise or question of doubt or opposition. It thrusts a probe or shoots a flash of light into the mind that challenges attention and thought. It punctuates discourse with a sharp point that stabs the listless mind awake. It is still a rhetorical device that nearly all writers use for this purpose, and some of the most striking and brilliant writers, such as G. G. Chesterton, have a degree of genius in its invention and use.

These and other methods in the teachings of Jesus attracted and held the attention of His hearers and have made Him to this day the supreme teacher of the world. They caused His hearers to exclaim, "A new teaching!" and so do they challenge us.—Presbyterian Banner.

"IT IS A GOOD THING TO GIVE THANKS."

F. B. Stone.

Oft our downcast faces witness
To our cold, ungrateful ways,
And the quickest way to light them
Is with thankfulness and praise;
May our loving God forgive us
For this oft-repeated sin,
That has stamped our very faces
With the thanklessness within.

May we learn to thank our Father
For the gifts He has bestowed,
Ere we go to Him for others,
And our cup be overflowed.
He will bless us, surely bless us,
When we gratefulness shall show,
For the thankful heart goes singing
With a joy none others know.

Making Toys a Treat.

Helen received five dolls for Christmas last year. Within two days one was broken and the others did not interest her particularly because she had received so many other gifts throughout the year that these were no treat.

Yet this same little miss of five spent the morning not long after playing on my back steps with the parings we had cut from a bunch of turnips. She had a glorious time tying strips of pink gingham on the longest parings "pertending" she had dollies with curly hair. And why was she so much more interested in these imaginary dolls, the only tangible evidence of which was their makeshift curls, than she was in the beautiful dolls she had received at Christmas? Almost all children are eager to make something or do something themselves without interference—to have a chance to use simple materials and their own imagination.

Making use of every-day things teaches children to be creative besides amusing them, usually, far more than ready-made toys do, especially when given in an over-abundance. There are countless ways that a mother or father can let children make their own fun. For example, one of the happiest boys we have seen in many a day was swinging in an old auto tire he had hung from a tree, to make a swing that was "different" and a substitute, used, no doubt, because of lack of rope. A short piece of rope was used, however, to suspend this old tire from a tree and the boy was getting an extra thrill by the "bounce" of the rubber as well as the sway of it as he sat "inside" and held on to the sides of the tire.

Of course, not all children want to do things for themselves and if they lack initiative, a little help in starting them to fashion toys that they will enjoy, is a sure way to build up their interest in creating, in both a material and mental sense. If Betty's doll furniture goes to pieces, let Betty mend it or make it over, or devise something to take its place. If Bobbie's toy dog loses its leash or collar, let him make a new one or "invent" a harness that will serve the purpose.

A few suggestions from adults, at the start, will put children on the "right track" and after that, "little interference" is the best rule if the children are really to learn for themselves. They should not be over-stimulated by outside help or by outside prodding. Even babies will enjoy the game of making playthings—of course, very simple ones.

When the children come to realize the work that goes into their making, toys will be truly "a treat!"—National Kindergarten Association.

POWER.

E. C. M.

Mighty King of Babylon,
We have word from you—
"Whom I would I kept alive,
And whom I would, I slew;
Whom I would, I lifted up,
And whom I would, brought down."
Mighty King of Babylon,
Great is your renown!

Knocking, knocking at the gate:
Into ruin fall,
Horse and foot and chariot,
Scepter, throne, and wall!
And of all exalted high,
What the trace of today?
Just a line of history,
Just a square of clay.

But there came the Carpenter,
Walking by the sea;
Drew to Him the fishermen
Out of Galilee:
Gave, of His compassion vast
And His poverty,
Wealth beyond all Babylons:
Immortality!

An Incident of Gladstone's Life.

Many years ago Mr. Gladstone heard of two young men in the village who had become notorious for their drinking habits and he determined to make an effort to save them. He invited them to see him at the castle, and there, in "the Temple of Peace", as his library was called, he impressively appealed to them to change their ways, and then knelt with them, and fervently asked God to sustain and strengthen them in their resolve to abstain from that which had hitherto done them so much harm. The sequel cannot be told better than in the language of one of the men concerned who says, "Never can I forget the scene, and as long as I live the memory of it will be indelibly impressed on my mind. The Grand Old Man was profoundly moved by the intensity of his solicitation. My companion is now a prominent minister, and neither of us has touched a drop of intoxicating drink since, nor are we ever likely to violate an undertaking so impressively ratified in Mr. Gladstone's library."—Parish Visitor.

Resolve, when you awake, that it shall be to some faithful purpose, and that your renovated powers shall be obedient to him who has renewed them! And throw a glance backward before your eyes are weighed in sleep to see how well you have kept the morning's resolution!—N. L. Frothingham.

THANKFULNESS.

Martha Lee Doughty.

God has given the gift of sight
So I enjoy the stars at night
And earth bathed in gleaming moonlight
Then long days when sun shines bright
And I thank Him.

God has sent me pain and sorrow
Sharply I felt each long arrow;
Times I could no pleasure borrow,
But the thought of a tomorrow
And I thank Him.

He has given the gift of smell,
So I enjoy the fields where dwell
All perfumes that I like so well,
The odor from a big sea shell,
And I thank Him.

He has given the gift to hear,
The roaring Ocean's angry fear;
Strong winds that through the tree tops tear
Small crickets singing far and near,
And I thank Him.

The gift to feel wind's kind caress,
To help some one who's in distress;
And lift a burden from one pressed,
Oh, I do feel so often blessed!
And I thank Him.

He has given friends tried and true,
That help me fight life's battle through;
Pleasures many and troubles, too,
The years which pass and seem so few,
And I thank Him.

Her Thanksgiving Surprise Party.

"One, two, three and a half minutes yet."

Alicia was counting. Counting the minutes until she would go to a party, do you think? Really you might guess a long time and never come near being right. Alicia was counting the minutes until a freight train should whistle and rush past her window.

Not much of a sight, you think; just a common freight train with cars full of wheat and lumber and maybe some loaded with squealing pigs.

But listen! If you are twelve years old and lived on a lonely farm and had not been able to get out of your bed and walk for six long years, not since you were six years old, and you couldn't go to school, of course, and very few people lived near enough to come and see you—well, that would be different, wouldn't it?

It did not matter whether it was a freight train or a passenger train, when it came by, she would wave her little flag at the engineer and the trainmen and always get a cherry wave in return.

Often the freight trains stopped for some time on a long siding near the house and switched off cars to be loaded with grain or cattle, and then one of the men would run over to the house for a pail of milk; so they knew why the girl could not walk like other children.

Even at night when trains passed Alicia would flash her electric torch three times and see the answering bobs of lanterns.

Alicia's father and mother loved her dearly, but the farm did not pay well enough to let them get money ahead so they could leave it for a better place. The ground was poor and Mr. Smith did not understand farming as well as he ought; so they had not been able to send Alicia to a hospital for the particular sort of care she needed.

Sometimes when a train would have quite a wait on the siding one of the men would run over to her window with a little gift of a book or candy. She did not know that the men had passed the word along to all the train crews that a committee had been appointed to consult a noted surgeon about her.

And then one day, just three days before Thanksgiving, a wonderful thing happened. A special train stopped on the siding; and instead of one man coming over for milk, she saw a regular procession coming.

"One, two, three, four," she counted. "Why, mother," she called, "there are ten men coming, and they are bringing a lot of things with them!"

It was true. Very much amazed, Mrs. Smith opened the door, and in they came, laughing and saying: "We have come to bring a glad Thanksgiving to little Alicia."

And you should have seen those gifts—a comfy wheeled chair, a bix box with soft, rose-bordered blankets for Alicia's bed, another box with a soft, fuzzy, rose-colored bathrobe and slippers to match, two beautifully covered pillows, the most beautiful doll and little girl could ever want and a doll trunk full of dainty clothes for her dollyship, and, last of all, a most mysterious sealed envelope not to be opened until the 10:40 freight passed the next morning.

With cheeks flushed from excitement she thanked the men, holding closer in her small arms everything they could hold; and when the men had gone her interest was divided between the wonders she could see and the mysterious envelope.

That night she could hardly sleep, she was so excited over the mystery, and she whispered a great deal to the dear doll cuddled in her arms; but morning really did come at last, and after such an age the long, sharp whistle of the 10:40 freight. It had barely passed when the envelope was opened. There was a bright Thanksgiving card and an extra note saying that the next day she would have a call from Dr. Slocum, whose special business it was to help little girls to get well.

Wasn't it fine? All those trainmen had raised a fund to pay all expenses. Alicia was shy when Dr. Slocum came as promised, but he quickly gained her confidence and assured her that it would not be so very long before she could walk and run and climb up on the fence to wave at the trains instead of doing it from her bed.

"You have been a brave girl for a long time, Alicia," said the kind surgeon, "and you will be ready when the nurse comes for you in three days?"

Alicia looked at him anxiously. "Doctor, must I leave all those lovely things at home?"

"No, indeed!" he replied quickly. "Bring them all with you if you like, especially that fine doll. And I don't know who is going to be happiest when you come home all well, you or your parents or the trainmen or I myself."

"I know," said Alicia; "it will be all of us, every one. Never, never could any one have such a beautiful surprise party. I will be ready when the nurse comes, doctor, and I will be brave, truly I will, and I will be glad every day always."

And so you see, the loving gifts of many hearts. For it all came true, as Dr. Slocum thought, and Alicia was able to walk like other children. And, of course, she often and often climbed up on the fence to wave greetings to her loyal friends, the trainmen, and they were all happy always.—S. S. Times.

A PILGRIM AND A STRANGER.

Part 2.

Myrtle Humphries.

So it chanced that on the morrow, there came a farmer who supplied the Harders with butter. He said he needed a dog and would be glad to take this one; so he shut Sandy in his car. Sandy strained at his chain, whining piteously, and all the little Harders put their knuckles to their eyes and howled as he was borne away.

It was twenty-five miles to the farmer's home and the drive seemed long to Sandy. Upon arriving, he was bundled unceremoniously out of the car, and then left to his own devices. He wandered about the place and encountered two other farm dogs who rushed, barking at him. Sandy thrashed them both and was in turn thrashed by the farmers' wife, who said he was ill-tempered. He snarled at her and then fled to the woods for refuge.

Drearily he wandered about. Was he forever doomed to be a pilgrim and a stranger? He remembered the little Harders who had cheerfully denied themselves a meal that he might be fed. Then he recalled how caressing was the touch of Baby Harder's wee fingers, and a wave of homesickness swept over him. For a moment, he sniffed the air, and then resolutely trotted down the road toward the town he had left that morning.

Mid-day gave place to afternoon. A small boy carrying a bucket of milk came down the road. He set the bucket on the ground while he descended a bank in quest of berries. Sandy drank the milk and then stood grinning and wagging his tail as they returned; but he was unprepared for the storm of reproaches by which he was assailed. Fleeing down the road, he easily outran the boy. After all, the milk was but a light lunch. He paused at several farmhouses and sniffed wistfully about, but found no other food.

The sun seemed unbearably hot as he resumed his journey. A crowd of noisy, motorists swept by, and one of them flung a bottle which dealt the dog a heavy blow. Sandy's feet were becoming sore, and his back ached from the blow he had received. Pausing by the wayside, he licked his paws. He would have preferred to lick something more nourishing, but nothing else was forthcoming; so with a plaintive whine, he resumed his pilgrimage.

He revived presently upon catching sight of a flock of chickens, which were quietly feeding in a barnyard. The hens cackled and scattered in all directions, as he came lunging into them with flying ears and clumsy paws. He sniffed at the food, of which they had been partaking, and found to his disgust that it was grain. In revenge for this disappointment, he chased the turkey gobbler into the highway, and then once again loped on his way toward the home of the little Harders. He grew so tired presently that he was no longer tempted to harry anything; and to add to his troubles there was no water. It had not rained for several weeks, and all the brooks were dry. Sandy's tongue lolled out, and he panted wearily as he plodded on.

It was evening before he reached home. Faint, lame, and half-blinded by fatigue, Sandy limped over the bridge into the village, just as the bell in St. John's tower was ringing the Angelus. Gleams of sunlight still illuminated the mountain tops, but down in the village, twilight was gathering and lights gleamed through the windows. Slowly and painfully, Sandy hobbled down the street, and turning in at the Harder gate, limped around to the stable.

He wondered a little at finding the door open; but upon entering he encountered another surprise. On the floor was a saucepan of water, and beside it was a heap of table scraps neatly piled in a little pyramid. Bunny Harder might be a pygmy in stature, but his heart was the heart of a gentleman; and he had conducted himself like a man and a brother. All day long, he had collected scraps, and had even concealed part of his own dinner in the pockets of his rompers. Then when evening came, he carefully placed them on the stable floor and filled the saucepan with water. Tom and Ted scoffed disdainfully at these preparations.

"Maybe he'll come back," protested Bunny.

"Shucks!" retorted Tom. "He can't come back. He's too far away; and even if he could walk that far, the old farmer wouldn't let him come. He'll probably make Sandy tend sheep and run a churn. He'll half starve him an' kick him around, and maybe beat him to death!"

Bunny's rosy face lengthened upon hearing this dismal prophecy, but still he left the food upon the floor. It had been a dreary day at the Harder home. Bunny and the girls wept openly, and even Tom was seen to resort to his handkerchief in rather a surreptitious manner. Secretly Mrs. Harder's heart misgave her.

Meanwhile, out in the stable, Sandy ate the scraps and drank the water. Then he slept for an hour and awoke refreshed. Silently approaching the house, he found the back door to be ajar. All lights in the kitchen had been switched off, but Mr. and Mrs. Harder were in the brightly-lighted living-room. Apparently, the children were in bed. Sandy thought wistfully of the baby and wished he might see her. One of her little socks lay upon the kitchen floor, and he licked it fondly. Then he gathered it in his mouth, and treading softly that there might be no audible footfall, he skulked through the kitchen and hid himself behind a hamper in the scullery.

Mrs. Harder broke a long silence. "Really, Charles," she remarked to her husband, "I sometimes reproach myself for letting that dog go. After all, he was not at all vicious, but only mischievous. The children felt so badly. I hope the farmer will not ill-treat him."

Mr. Harder laughed as he laid down his paper. "The dog is probably safe enough," he responded; "but the children were fond of him. How blue the little rascals looked when I came home at noon. Well, my dear," with a yawn "I am uncommonly tired and I'm going to retire early."

"I must put an extra covering over the baby," observed Mrs. Harder. "The night is growing chilly," and shortly afterward, they locked the doors and went upstairs.

After they were gone, Sandy crept from his hiding place and went softly into the darkened living-room. Turning in his tracks several times, he curled himself upon the rug and went to sleep. Deep silence settled upon the house.

Outside there was the occasional hum of a motor as a car swept past, but by eleven o'clock the village street was deserted. Once or twice Sandy was aroused by twinges of pain in his sore feet, but he was so tired that he soon relapsed into slumber. The moon rose and illuminated the lawn where the asters stood nodding their heavy heads. An owl hooted in a nearby tree, but finally subsided into silence.

Sandy must have slept for several hours when he was suddenly awakened by a sense of something wrong. Rising to his feet, he listened intently. A dim forboding made him long to sit upon his haunches and howl, but he prudently restrained such an impulse. He reflected that Mrs. Harder might hear and drive him out. He walked through the lower rooms, but everything seemed quiet. Then he trod softly up the stairs and, with unerring instinct, stalked directly toward the baby's room.

She slept by herself in a little room at the far end of the upper hall. Evidently her door had been left ajar, but had blown shut, although it was not hasped. Surely the moonlight about her door was obscured by a strange ominous haze. Sandy sniffed the air and whined plaintively. Then he pushed against the door with his nose. It yielded and he entered. The air was so thick that he coughed.

She lay with her doll beside her and her chubby arms uncovered. Vainly he tried to attract her attention. He took the counterpane in his teeth and dragged it from the bed, but she remained unaware of his presence. Putting his paws upon the bed, he licked her face and whined eagerly, but still she did not stir. Evidently she was stupefied by the smoke. Meanwhile the door which the dog had opened was admitting a strong draught, and suddenly a lurid flash illuminated the room. In another instant, the window curtains were a mass of flames. No longer was Sandy anxious to conceal his presence from Mrs. Harder. He uttered a deep bay and rushed tumultously from the room. Dashing down the hall, he scratched frantically upon the panels of Mrs. Harder's door, and his furious barking aroused the household.

He never clearly remembered what happened next. There was a confused recollection of Mrs. Harder rushing past him in her nightdress, while her husband followed with a blanket. Suddenly the hall seemed filled with little children in their sleeping garments, and in their midst was Mrs. Harder with the baby in her arms. Then they all vanished down the stairs, Tom and Ted dragging Bunny with them. Evidently Bunny wondered what all the uproar was about. However, he became thoroughly awake as he espied the dog.

"'Lo, Sandy," he chirped, joyously. "I just knew you'd come back."

Mr. Harder was at the telephone, and directly afterward, the fire trucks came plunging down the street.

. . . . .

"And Sandy's to stay wif us forever'n ever."

Peggy Harder uttered the above statement gleefully. It was morning and the Harders were breakfasting with a neighbor. Sandy sat beside the dining table, and was being regaled with griddle cakes and bacon.

"I cannot understand how he entered the house," repeated Mrs. Harder, still puzzling over this unsolved problem.

"And you won't send him away again, will you Mother?" reiterated Peggy.

"Send him away!" cried Mrs. Harder.

"No, indeed! The baby would have burned to death if it had not been for Sandy. Send him away, indeed! No! No! I would as soon think of sending one of you children away."

Thereupon there rose a great chorus of acclamation. Even the baby took her thumb from her mouth and played pat-a-cake with he wee hands. Sandy wagged his tail and grinned, and all the little Harders sang for joy.

Two Weeks.

Halsa Alison Kyser.

The postman's whistle blew. Mother went to the door for the mail. "Poor Kitty," she thought to herself as she went; "She surely is lonesome cut off from her little friends." When she returned, Kitty was lying with her face buried in the pillow.

"O Mother," she sobbed, "do I have to stay at home for two whole weeks. I am not sick, even if I have got mumps."

"Darling, you might give it to some one else if you went out too soon," answered mother. "But, look, what came for you in the mail."

Kitty jumped up and took the little package and letter her mother held out.

"Oh, see!" she cried, opening the package; "it's from Ruth, and it's some of those nice water colors in tubes, like she has. Here is the note."

It read: "Dear Kitty: We miss you at school, and will be glad when the two weeks are up. Look for the mail tomorrow. Your friend, Ruth."

"Do you guess I will get something tomorrow?"

"Wait and see," smiled mother.

Kitty could hardly wait for the mail next day, but sure enough, there was another package addressed to "Miss Kitty Gray." This time it was a drawing book, so she entertained herself all the afternoon with the new book and paints. The next day there was a bag of oranges, then came a box of dominoes, a little book to read, and a puzzle to work.

Kitty was quite happy now, the excitement of the postman's daily visit had helped her through the first week.

"Mother," she said on Sunday morning, "there is no mail today," and she looked so sad that Mother had to laugh.

About twelve o'clock the door bell rang, and mother went to the door, and there stood Betty, Ruth, and all the rest of her Sunday-school class with a lovely bunch of lilies.

"They are for Kitty," they told Mrs. Gray. "Miss Lee said we could bring them from the church." The week passed quickly, each day one of her classmates sent some little gift. There was a box of marsh-mallows, a pretty handkerchief, a little purse, a string of beads, paper dolls, to cut out, a bottle of perfume; then it was Sunday with more flowers, and oh! goody, Monday, and back at school again with all her little friends.

"Mother," said Kitty that night, "I am so happy, everybody was so good to me when I had to stay at home, and I love them all!"

SOME ONE showed mercy to these lads. Because of some one's Christmas gift they are today receiving food, clothing, medical care and Christian training. But what of the

MULTITUDES YET IN NEED

"Every night the last sound we heard was the moaning, sobbing cry of the sixty homeless lepers outside the gate," says a traveller, speaking of a leper Hospital which he had recently visited. "Every morning we looked down upon that same crowd lying on the ground."

There are countless lepers like these; shall they be rescued for lives of Christian usefulness?

Increase your own Christmas joy, and put the light of hope into these darkened lives by sending a Christmas gift today.

WHAT DOLLARS WILL DO

$2—a blanket for a leper.

Wins Wife as First Prize!

IF you don't think your whole life can be changed by chance, read this. It is the story of a young man who was pretty well down and out, but he figured he might win a prize if he took some advice.

"As far back as I can remember I had been a weakling," says Mr. Calvin L. Floyd of Orlando, Florida. "A headache, it seemed, was to be my life companion. I was always dizzy in the mornings. Nothing I ate seemed good for me. Then I attended a health lecture in a sanatorium and the physician talked on 'faulty elimination.' That was certainly my trouble. One of the patients asked him about Nujol. He recommended it highly. I decided to try one bottle to see if there was anything in what he said about natural lubrication for the human body.

Many a life changed by a message like this one.

"Long before I had finished the first bottle my 'companion-headache' was gone. No more tired out feeling. I get a real kick out of life now. By the way, I almost forgot to tell you I found a new life companion, too!"

Perfectly simple, wasn't it? Mr. Floyd just learned the normal natural way to get rid of bodily poisons (we all have them) and nature did the rest. Why shouldn't you be well?

Nujol is not a medicine. It contains no drugs. It is effective, so you will be "regular as clock-work." You can buy it at all good drug stores in sealed packages for less than the price of a couple of good cigars.

Begin today. Millions have found that Nujol makes all the difference in the world. Nujol will make you feel fine and you can prove it.

Seek Aid to Restore Historic Grub Hill Church

AMELIA COUNTY, VA.

A thousand or more descendants and relatives of men and women who, a hundred years or more ago, were buried in the cemetery of Grub Hill Protestant Episcopal Church, in Amelia County, Virginia, and many others as well have become interested in a project for the restoration of the ancient church and cemetery, the re-marking of all the graves and perpetual care of the historic burying-ground.

These plans have now been perfected—for the repair of the building, the reconstruction of the interior; the beautification of the cemetery, its enclosure by a brick wall, and the laying of flagstone walks therein; and for perpetual care of the church and graves.

Now that the Foundation has been perfected, and legal incorporation completed, the officers and directors will advise all known relatives of those who lie buried there and will seek to learn from them and elsewhere, the names of others. All these will be given opportunity to add to the Foundation fund which will establish and maintain forever a historic shrine and that will mean much to Amelia County and to the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Southern Virginia.

Officers and Directors.

The officers of Grub Hill Memorial Foundation, Inc., are:

George B. Townsend, of Petersburg, President; Mrs. M. M. Eggleston, of Amelia, Vice-President; Philip Freeman, Stony Creek, Chancellor; the Rev. Edwin R. Carter, D. D., Petersburg, Secretary; Rev. J. R. McAllister, Dinwiddie, Treasurer.

Portrait of Bishop Guerry.

A portrait of the late Bishop William Alexander Guerry, Bishop of South Carolina, was presented at the meeting of the Fourth Synod of the Diocese, meeting at Columbia. The presentation was by the Rev. Alexander R. Mitchell, Chairman of the committee under supervision of which the portrait was prepared, and the reception in behalf of the diocese, was by Bishop K. G. Finlay.

Bishop Lewis W. Burton presided at the meetings of the Synod. Mrs. James R. Cain, President of the Women's Auxiliary, presided at the meetings of that organization. The opening address there was by Miss Grace Lindley, Executive Secretary, who was followed by Miss Margaret Marston and the Rev. F. J. Clark, leading a conference on advance work of the Church. Much of the time of the Synod was given to consultation on Evangelism, in which clergy and laity of the dioceses of the State are deeply interested and determined to be aggressively active.

Service in Venerable Church.

Sunday afternoon, November 10, the Rev. Franklin J. Clark, of New York, conducted services and made an address in St. Andrew's Church, St. Andrew's Parish, near Charleston, S. C. Fall Meeting of Clergy.

The clergy of the Diocese of Upper South Carolina held their fall meeting in St. John's Church, Columbia, October 15 and 16. The opening address of the meeting was delivered by the Rev. John Moore Walker, rector of St. Peter's Church, Charlotte, N. C. The evening was given to the business of adjusting the old convocational system to the new organization and life of the Church. Whereas, the two convocations of the diocese have formerly met separately there is now a distinct need, especially in the fall, of having all the clergy meet together for conference and inspiration.

A celebration of the Holy Communion opened the activities of the second day. Bishop Finlay was assisted by the Rev. G. Croft Williams, rector of St. John's Church. Plans for the Every Member Canvass and other activities of the diocese were outlined by the bishop and thoroughly discussed by the clergy.

Bishop Finlay, with the help of the executive secretary, the Rev. A. Rufus Morgan, plans to present to each vestry of the diocese an outline of complete organization in preparation for the canvass and for the later follow-up work.

Kanuga Conferences' Association.

Reports of a satisfactory and successful summer of camps and conferences were received by the Board of Managers of Kanuga Conferences Association at their meeting in Trinity Parish House, Columbia, S. The property of the Association consists of four hundred acres of land with hotel, four annexes, thirty-nine cottages, all completely furnished, together with a lake of some eighteen acres with a pavilion and other buildings. It is located near Hendersonville, Diocese of Western North Carolina. For the past two summers conferences have been conducted for various phases of the Church's life; for boys and girls from ten years up, and of high school and college age, for the women of the Auxiliary, for church school workers, and for the clergy. The property has been under the direct management of the Rt. Rev. K. G. Finlay and the Rev. A. Rufus Morgan, pending the organization and functioning of the Board of Managers.

Those present at the meeting of the Board were: representing the Diocese of South Carolina: the Rt. Rev. Albert S. Thomas, the Rev. H. W. Starr, Ph. D., and Mrs. E. E. Rembert; representing the Diosese of East Carolina: the Rev. I. deL. Brawshaw and Major Joseph F. Huske; representing the Diocese of Western North Carolina: the Rev. J. W. C. Rt. Rev. H. St. George Tucker, Bishop.

Rector Assumes New Charge.

The Rev. Charles W. Sheerin assumed the rectorship of Grace and Holy Trinity Church, Richmond, last Sunday, November 17. The former rector, the Rev. Dr. W. H. Buckhart, has had to resign on account of ill health,, but as rector emeritus he will still be active in the work, though relieved of the responsibilities by Mr. Sheerin.

Mr. Sheerin leaves one of the largest churches in the Diocese of Texas, St. Paul's, Waco, to come back to Virginia. Before going to Texas he had charge of Trinity Church, Fredericksburg, Virginia.

Mr. and Mrs. Sheerin and their two children are now visiting Mrs. Sheerin's parents, just outside of Richmond, but they will soon move into town. Mrs. Sheerin before her marriage was Miss Maria Ward Skelton Williams, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Lewis C. Williams, of Richmond.

The church was well filled Sunday morning with members of the congregation and many friends of the new rector.

Mr. Sheerin is well known to many of the congregation and comes with the determination of making this congregation one of the foremost in the diocese for its good works. In order that he may at once become acquainted with his people, the vestry and Church Service League will give a reception Friday night, November 22, in the parish house, from eight to ten o'clock. All members of the congregation are urged to be present and the bishop and all Episcopal ministers in the city and their wives will be the specially invited guests.

Personal Notes

The Rev. E. H. Eckel, Jr., rector of St. Paul's-on-the-Hill, St. Paul, Minn., since February, 1918, has accepted a call to the rectorship of Trinity Church, Tulsa, Oklahoma, and will enter upon his new duties January 1, 1930.

Humiliating Children Before Others.

"Daddy, please give me a dime," coaxed Teddy. "I want to buy a whistle."

There were guests present who were to dine with them that evening, and Daddy was going upstairs to dress. Laughing, the father tossed something to the child.

Thinking it was a dime, Teddy reached eagerly for a small piece of leather. Humiliation and embarrassment flushed the little face.

You know how we adults dislike being embarrassed before a crowd. Well, so do children. And yet how often we try to have a little fun at children's expense. They can easily tell whether we are laughing with them, or at them.

To make fun of a sensitive, self-conscious child before a crowd causes him to suffer acute pangs of embarrassment.

I showed Aunt Emmy-Lou the above when I had written it.

"I am so glad you are writing that article, my dear," she told me with her usual enthusiasm. "Never shall I forget an embarrassing incident which happened to me when a child. My father took me with him to a shoe store to buy himself a pair of shoes. While we were there the salesman said, 'I have some shoes that I think the little lady would like.' 'Very well,' Father agreed, 'we'll have her try them on. Emmy-Lou, take off your shoes.' 'But Father, some other time!' I begged, my face flushing. 'Why some other time?' Father asked, crisply. 'I'll explain later, Father,' I begged, now so embarrassed I could scarcely speak. But Father announced, 'No, now is the time, Emmy-Lou. Don't keep the salesman waiting.' Close to tears I tried again, 'But Father, there's a big hole in my stocking!' 'Oh, is that all?' Father laughed uproariously. 'Take off your shoes and no more nonsense.' Of course I obeyed, but I shall never forget how badly I wanted to cry or better yet to walk out of the store. But there was nothing to do but to take off my shoes, and thought I was but a tiny girl I remember how I wished the floor would open up and swallow me. And I kept thinking, 'Mother wouldn't have done that. She would have told the salesman, "We'll be in some other day!" ' "

Children know when treatment is unsympathetic or unfair. We can avoid friction and unhappiness by dealing understandingly and sympathetically with them. Suppose we put ourselves in their places and treat them as we would wish to be treated if our places were reversed. Let us try to get their point of view. In this way we shall grow in the esteem of our boys and girls, not because we are parents, but because we are deserving of respect. Then, by our daily example, the children, too, will grow to be thoughtful and considerate of others.—Helen Gregg Green, in National Kindergarten Association Release.

"Let courage rise with danger
Never be downcast;

NO TIME TO LET UP

It has been well said that a dead fish can float downstream with the current, but only a live fish can breast a heavy current and swim upstream.

In the business world the live fish are not as numerous as they should be. When summer heat begins to overtake some business concerns they promptly plan to curtail their activities, reduce their selling forces or keep their salesmen at home, saying to themselves: "There is no use hunting for business until business is ready to hunt us."

Summer activities should be pushed with more energy than winter activity. Summer publicity ought to be carried on continuously with just as much vigor as in the heart of winter, indeed, with greater vigor. The man who lessens publicity work or the activities of his salesmen, merely because of the summer season or because he thinks he can thereby save a little money, is making a mistake. The concern which meets business inactivity or depression with greater enthusiasm and activity sweeps over all obstacles and goes steadily forward. When fall comes everything goes ahead, with the sales force pressing forward and a publicity campaign actively underway.

In a country of about 120,000,000 people—the most active, virile, energetic and intelligent in all the world—unvexed by arbitrary laws which afflict the different nationalities in Europe, there is always in the aggregate a vast amount of business. These people must continue to buy food and clothes. They purchase automobiles, they build homes, they buy furniture, they travel, they invest in securities, they require machinery of many kinds and, even though the country may not be "full speed ahead" the hustling concern gets it share of business.

When people talk about depression they must remember that to some extent it is psychological and mental, and the more a man talks depression the more he discourages the country and the less business he does himself. Millions of people in this country have been planning to do construction work of some kind and make various purchases, for which they have the money available, but they hold off, waiting to see what some other fellow is going to do or if the world is actually coming to an end. They act as though they expected the sky to fall, forgetting that if it did fall they could not carry their money into the other world. It would, however, be a great thing to feel that in a time of uncertainty they had done their utmost to create employment for other people.

Are you doing your share?—Manufacturers Record.

Vol. 94. RICHMOND, VA., NOVEMBER 30, 1929. No. 48.

A MESSAGE TO THE CHURCH FROM THE PRESIDING BISHOP

Chicago, Illinois, November 18, 1929.

To the Bishops and other Pastors and to the Laity of the Protestant Episcopal Church:
Greeting:

A Special Committee of the House of Bishops has announced my election as Presiding Bishop to fill the vacancy caused by the lamented death of Bishop Murray. This Committee has also commended me, in kind and generous words, to the good-will and co-operation of the Church. I have appointed the Bishop of South Dakota as my assessor and shall rely very much upon his knowledge and experience.

Bishop Murray had won a place in the esteem and affection of the people of the church that I cannot hope to fill and that I shall not be expected to fill. There was, however, one outstanding feature of Bishop Murray's administration wherein I think I can follow in his footsteps. Bishop Murray stood for the whole Church. He had no geographical or ecclesiastical prejudices. The Church at home and the Church abroad shared equally in his tender solicitude. There was no North, South, East or West in his make-up. Every part of the Church knew that it could count on the love and loyalty of its chief Bishop. He also had the capacity of entering into affectionate relationships with many people whose views he could not entirely share. It was more than tolerance. It was sympathy. I venture to hope and believe that I can perpetuate this characteristic of Bishop Murray's ministry, even though I have neither his wisdom nor his goodness.

In this first word which I am permitted to address to my large constituency I desire to urge the necessity of putting first things first. There is constant danger that the end may be obscured by the means thereto. "Seek ye first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness." That is our goal as individuals and as a Church. The Church must use means towards this end. Organization is necessary; machinery is necessary; money is necessary. The Church cannot carry on a nation-wide and world-wide enterprise, with many laborers and many agencies in many fields, without efficient organization and large sums of money. Let this be said once for all. But organization and money and buildings are only means to an end, not an end in themselves. It cannot be said too often that the main concern of the Church is religion. When men and women have the love of God in their heart, when personal discipleship to Christ begets a passion for humanity and peace and righteousness, when Church people realize what is involved in Christian discipleship in this twentieth century which is so unlike any other century, when the wide scope and long reach of the Christian religion take hold upon people's minds when the people of this Church, the faithful, recognize that, like their Lord, they are not to be ministered unto, but to minister, to win souls and make new allegiances to Jesus Christ, when men and women love the Church as the Body of Christ and the Sacraments as means of grace, when they use the Church as an executive agency for reconciling the world to God, when sinners are being converted and penitents brought to the foot of the cross and the followers of Christ find peace and joy in believing, when there is being "added to the Church daily such as should be saved," when such things as these are happening in the realm of spiritual experience, the Church is alive and accomplishing her purpose. In this atmosphere love of the Church will grow; friends and helpers of the Church organizations will multiply; mutual confidence will dispel misunderstanding; legitimate and constructive criticism of the Church's methods will contain no element of uncharity. Money will come in answer to the call of the Church; young men and women will offer themselves for various ministries. Let us put first things and trust in the promise of Christ, "Seek ye first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness and all these things will be added unto you."

I hope that it will not be necessary for me to say much about money matters during my short term of office. I have no skill at that sort of thing. Others have, whose services will doubtless be available to me and to our National Council. But there is one money matter about which I must now speak with all the solemnity that belongs to my new responsibility. The end of the year is approaching and the present outlook is not bright. Christmas is approaching and it threatens to be a sad one for many whom we ought to make merry. I want to send my loving Christmas greetings to all the men and women and boys and girls of the Church throughout the world. In particular I should like to send a special "Merry Christmas and Happy New Year" to our representatives in the mission field—to Bishops, Priests, Deacons, Deaconesses, Sisters, Teachers, Doctors, Nurses—in China and Japan, in Liberia, Alaska, Mexico, Brazil, in the islands of the seas and in our own home land. It will be a terrible incongruity, it will have all the earmarks of official insincerity, if, at the same time as their chief pastor sends his "Merry Christmas," our National Council should have to notify several Bishops that some fine pieces of Christian work will have to be abandoned and some first-rate workers withdrawn from their fields. This would break the hearts of many of the Church's best men and women who are serving our Lord and the Church with splendid ability and devotion. It will stifle enthusiasm, paralyze faith, and reflect very seriously on the spiritual vitality of the Church. It is not too late to avert such a catastrophe, but it will be too late if the people of the Church procrastinate.

I ask the love of the Church and the prayers of the Church for our National Council at this critical time, and for me, upon whose shoulders there has been so unexpectedly placed "the care of all the Churches."

Faithfully yours,
CHARLES P. ANDERSON, Presiding Bishop.

THE ATONEMENT AS BELIEVED BY BISHOP ANDERSON

There is a green hill far away,
Without a city wall,
Where the dear Lord was crucified
Who dies to save us all.

He died that we might be forgiven,
He died to make us good,
That we might go at last to heaven,
Saved by His precious blood.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Patience is the truest kind of courage.

"The empty wagon goes fastest and rattles most."

Nothing looks more attractive in the young than attention to the old.

Earth's crammed with heaven,
And every common bush afire with God,
But only he who sees takes off his shoes.
—E. B. Browning.

Many are "using" the Church, but there are all too few through whom the Church is operating.—Rev. William Porkess, D. D.

"Admit a God—that mystery supreme,
That cause uncaused—all wonders cease;
Nothing is marveolus for Him to do;
Deny Him, and all's mystery besides."

"I never knew you felt like that," said a friend to a Christian man who was noted for his reserve, but who had broken out on an occasion into the warmest and fullest expression about Christ. "Then the more shame to me" was the answer.—Selected.

I have long since ceased to pray, "Lord Jesus, have compassion on a lost world"! I remember the day and the hour when I seemed to hear the Lord rebuking me for making such a prayer. He seemed to say to me, "I have had compassion on a lost world, and now it is for you to have compassion."—Dr. A. J. Gordon.

Lord, we are few, but Thou art near,
Nor short Thine arm, nor deaf Thine ear;
O rend the heavens, come quickly down,
And make all hearts, O Lord, Thine own!

Many in this world run after felicity like an absent-minded man seeking his hat, while all the time it is on his head or in his hand.—Sydney Smith.

Once men thought that they had banished Napoleon. Then a whisper ran over France, "He is back". Those who had injured him trembled; those who had favored him smiled. Just when many had thought that God was banished a thrill runs through the world, "He is coming back".—Rev. J. R. Ewers.

How can God give us visions when life is hurrying at a precipitate rate? I have stood in the National Gallery and seen people gallop round the chamber and glance at twelve of Turner's pictures within five minutes. Surely we might say to each, "Be still and know Turner". Gaze quietly at one little bit of cloud, or at one branch, or at one wave of the sea, or at any one ray of the drifting moon. "Be still and know Turner." But he has difficulty in getting us still. I may have a Divine visitor in the shape of some worthy thought or noble impulse, but I am in such feverish haste that I do not heed it, and pass along. I do not "turn aside to see this great string", and so I lose this heavenly vision. If I would know more of God I must relax the strain and moderate the pace. I must be still. —Rev. J. H. Jowett.

THE VISIBLE, PERSONAL RETURN OF OUR LORD

In treating a matter of supreme importance to us all, I may assume that we are fully convinced that Jesus Christ is in truth the Son of God, and that nearly two thousand years ago He came into the world to save sinners, even at the cost of His own Incarnate life freely laid down for us upon the bitter Cross. We rejoice together also in His glorious Resurrection and Ascension through the heavens to the right hand of God. We glory in the fact that He is alive from the dead, victorious over sin and death and all the power of the enemy. We remember that, according to the Scriptures, He is coming again to judge the living and the dead; but it is quite possible that our thoughts may be in much confusion as to what is meant by His Coming and the End of the World.

For myself, I am free to confess that until shortly after my ordination at twenty-three years of age, I had not the slightest idea that there was any distinction between His coming to gather in His friends and His coming to judge His enemies and to establish His kingdom in righteousness. In my crude thinking I had always expected that He would return to judge the whole human race on one awful day of twenty-four hours, which I understood to be the Last Day. As to the manner in which the countless millions of the living and the dead were to give in their account to God, it never occurred to me to question. I believed that there would be an eternal separation between the evil and the good, but this most solemn Last Day was shrouded for me in uncertainty and gloom.

Then through God's great goodness I was thrown with enlightened Christian friends, who sent me to my Bible in new and wondrous light upon its sacred pages and gradually my whole outlook was altered. In the first place, I was enabled to see that the Last Day, far from being a day of twenty-four hours, was, like the Day of Grace, a long period of time, known as to its duration to God alone. In the light of the Scriptures it became evident that the Second Coming of our Lord was, as it were, the Dawn of the Day of Judgment, and that during that great period of time He would deal with His Holy Church, and His people Israel, and with the ungodly world at different times and in different ways.

A new and blessed hope was kindled in my heart as I began to see that our Lord was first of all coming to call His friends both from the living and the dead to meet Him "in the air". Every Christian delights in the opening words of the Fourteenth Chapter of St. John. There our blessed Master is speaking in private to the little company of His friends. Let not your heart be troubled," He says; "Ye believe in God, believe also in Me. In my Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so, I would have told you; I go to prepare a place for you; and if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto Myself, that where I am, there ye may be also."

In these heart-moving words it is obvious that our Lord is comforting those that love Him, and that His enemies are not in view, except as through conversion they, too, may be numbered among His friends. We remember, moreover, that our Lord's people constitute His Body, and I love to think that no eye will see the place which He is preparing for her until the Church, which is His Body, is fully ready. In other words, all of us who love Him will see the place simultaneously, and be with Him forever.

Nor should we forget the words of the holy Angels at the hour of our Lord's Ascension, when the disciples were gazing, as if entranced, at the cloud which had enveloped Him—"Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come, in like manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven."

It is interesting to observe here that no hostile eye ever saw the risen Redeemer. He showed Himself only to His friends, and only His friends were witnesses of His Ascension. It seems, therefore, not unreasonable to think that as His friends were the last to see Him go, so they will be the first to welcome Him back. This passage also assures us of His visible, personal return. His first coming was personal and visible, as was also His departure, and His second coming will be "in like manner". Eventually "every eye shall see Him", but not until after the members of the Body of Christ have met Him "in the air".

Let us now turn from our Lord and the Angels to St. Paul, and see what light he may throw upon our fascinating subject. The first of his inspired writings, in order of time, is his letter to the Thessalonians, which was written only about twenty years after our Lord's Ascension. The thought of our Lord's return runs through the whole Epistle like a golden thread. In chapter four we come upon the clearest possible statement. The great apostle is anxious to reassure his Thessalonian converts concerning their dead, and his comforting words are as much for us as for them. "We would not have you ignorant, brethren"—so he writes—"concerning them that are fallen asleep, that ye sorrow not, even as the rest, who have no hope." How solemn is the reflection that the whole non-Christian world looks into the region beyond the grave in the spirit of anxiety and fear. Multitudes of men, women and children are living, suffering and dying, day by day, in hopeless ignorance and superstition. They do not dream that God is love, nor do they know that the Infinite Redeemer has tasted death for them upon the Cross as really as for us. With what compassion does He regard them, whose precious Blood was shed for their redemption! They at least have never consciously rejected Him, and are less guilty than those in Christian lands, who wilfully turn their backs upon His Cross. What a marvel it is to know that the coming Judge has in every case died for the sinner that shall stand at His bar! And how should our hearts go out to these distressed and scattered ones, who are as sheep without a shepherd!

St. Paul's next words fall upon our ears with all the charm of heavenly music: "If we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with Him." We should never think of our Christian dead as in the cemetery. It is only the vacant tenement that is crumbling into dust: the tenant is gone. Every true believer who has fallen asleep in Jesus is "absent from the body, and at home with the Lord". Note with special care how grandly the Apostle goes on: "For this we say unto you by the Word of the Lord, that we that are alive, that are left unto the coming of the Lord, shall in no wise precede them that are fallen asleep. For the Lord Himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first; then we that are alive, that are left, shall together with them be caught up in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord. Wherefore comfort one another with these words."

St. Paul takes special pains to assure us that the above passage comes with all the authority of a voice from heaven. "This we say unto you," he declares, "by the Word of the Lord." So that when modern critics venture to say that St. Paul changed his mind as he grew older, we reply that then not only St. Paul but the Word of the Lord must have changed. On the contrary, you and I may humbly believe that St. Paul is as eagerly expecting our Lord's return today as he was looking for it then. True he is now at home with Christ, but only as a disembodied spirit. He and all enlightened believers on both sides of the Veil are watching and waiting for His coming as the signal of the resurrection of the Christian dead, and the clothing of the Christian living with bodies made like unto Christ's own body of glory. St. Paul enforces this great truth at the close of the fifteenth chapter of First Corinthians. We may then confidently believe that when Christ comes the Christian dead will rise, but the rest of the dead will be undisturbed; the Christian living will be changed "in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye", while the rest of the living will remain as they are. The meeting place between the Lord and His own is described as "in the air", and therefore may be out of sight of those left upon the earth. How solemn is the picture of this sudden and momentous separation! May you and I be ready when the trumpet shall sound!

Our Lord warns us that in the day when He shall be revealed the ungodly world will be as indifferent as in the days of Noah, and of Sodom and Gomorrah. Men will be engrossed with eating and drinking, buying and selling, planting and building, marrying and giving in marriage; when suddenly the Day of Grace will close and the Day of Judgment will begin. Let us "watch therefore and pray always that we may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of Man".

In this letter it is impossible to discuss the great chronological promises given us through the Prophet Daniel, but it is comforting to know that many sane and well-balanced Christians, men of profound culture and deep humility, are fully persuaded that the hour is very near when their ultimate fulfilment shall take place in the close of the present Dispensation and the return of our Lord for His Own. The late saintly Bishop of Durham, Handley Moule, writing as always with a deep sense of his responsibility to God, said in 1916: "I for one hold it possible in the light of the great chronological promises, that multitudes now living shall not see death till they have thus seen the Lord's Christ in the midst of us." You note the word possible. The Bishop was far too wise and good a man to speak with dogmatic certainty of that day and hour, which are known to God alone; but the Coming itself is a certainty, and all converging signs would seem to proclaim that it is near at hand.

It is especially interesting just now to recall the words of our Lord in St. Luke, chapter 21:24, concerning the Jews: "They shall fall by the edge of the sword, and shall be led away captive unto all nations; and Jerusalem shall be trodden under foot of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." Thus the Saviour set a limit to the suffering of Jerusalem from the foot of the oppressor. And we may ask with reverent hope, has not that limit now been reached? For centuries the Turk trod the Holy City under foot, but his power is broken at last and Jerusalem is free. It is true that a Gentile power is in control of Palestine, but the control is no longer that of an enemy. England, like the United States, is the friend of the Jew, and the friend of the Jew is the friend of God.

Moreover, the liberation of the Holy Land from the thraldom of the Turk was clearly a Divine Emancipation. England and her allies strove to keep Turkey with us in the great war; but, thank God, Turkey by her own act declared war against us, and thus made possible General Allenby's victorious campaign. What Christian was not thrilled when the glad tidings of great joy flashed throughout the world that the Union Jack was flying over Jerusalem and that the Holy City was free?

Anglo-Saxon peoples on both sides of the sea may well rejoice that it pleased God to confer upon an Anglo-Saxon nation the high honour of liberating the Holy Land, and thus opening the way for the return of His people Israel. (Under the term "Israel" are included, of course, both the House of Israel and the House of Judah.) It is beyond denial that God has used England and the United States more signally than He has used any other nation for the spread of His Holy Word and the Name and Gospel of His well-beloved Son. The United States may therefore justly stand behind England in the awfully responsible Protectorate of Palestine. For it must never be forgotten that the Jews are still, as a people, living in unbelief. There can never be lasting rest for Israel's weary foot and blinded heart until their eyes are opened to see in our Jesus their long-promised Messiah. The Scriptures are solemnly pledged to Israel's conversion and restoration as "life from the dead" to the world. But until that blessed hour comes they must continue to suffer. If we rightly understand the Scriptures, then England and the Jews are marching side by side to certain trouble. Their way lies through a very valley of the shadow of death; but on the other side of that dark valley shines "the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the Face of Jesus Christ".

The late Dr. Matheson used to speak of the Jew as "the world's blind lamplighter". To the Jew we owe all the light and all the hope we have—our Bible, our very Saviour we receive through the mysterious children of Abraham. And yet they are pathetically blind to the radiance they themselves have kindled. What will it be when their long-blinded eyes are opened to the glory of the coming Messiah? The whole world will ring with their mingled sorrow for the past and overflowing joy for the future. No people on the earth have such a history as theirs, and by far the most wonderful part of that history lies in the fact that it has all been foretold. The Bible has known all about it from the beginning. A glorious future lies before repentant Israel; for Isaiah has grandly prophesied in the Spirit, that "In days to come Jacob shall take root; Israel shall blossom and bud; and they shall fill the face of the world with fruit". (Isa. 27:6.)

The Bible divides the human race under three heads: (1) Israel, (2) the Gentile Nations, (3) The Church, called out from Jew and Gentile. The Lord is coming to deal first with His Church, then with Israel, and finally with the Nations in general. But it is not the Catholic Church, nor the Roman Catholic Church, but the Holy Catholic Church, "the Church, which is His Body". (Eph. 1:22, 23;) that shall rise to meet the Saviour when He comes. Only those blessed ones who have "washed their robes and made them white in the Blood of the Lamb" can share in the joy of that supreme hour, when the Redeemer comes back for His Own. It is also the hour of eternal reunion not only with our glorious Lord, but with each other. I for one am convinced that the Scriptures give us sure and certain hope of meeting again in fullest recognition all our loved ones, who have fallen asleep in Jesus. And while our longing hearts are waiting for that glad reunion let us rest upon the strong, calm words—Fear Not! I am the first and the last, and the Living One; and I was dead and behold, I am alive for evermore; and I have the keys of death and of the spirit world." We may be sure that no spirit passes in or out of that mysterious region save through Him who has the Keys. All are in His safe keeping. This truth strikes at the root of all Spiritism. Spiritualists have no communication with the dead, but are deceived by evil spirits who personate the dead. The only Holy Medium is the Lord Jesus Christ, and He holds together in Eternal life and love all His Own on both sides of the Veil. All who are in touch with Him are in touch with each other in the unity of the Spirit—"till He come".

St. Paul teaches us in the eighth chapter of his Letter to the Romans that the whole groaning and travailing creation is vitally concerned in the Second Advent of our Lord. "The earnest expectation of the creation," he says, "is waiting for the revealing (or unveiling) of the sons of God." Note well the plural. "That one far-off, supreme Event to which the whole Creation moves" is the unveiling not only of the Son of God, but also of "many sons", whom, through Christ, God is bringing unto glory. Already as to our essential life believers are "hidden with Christ in God; and when He Who is our life shall appear, then shall we also appear with Him in glory". When the Son of God comes to judge the world the sons of God will come with Him. You remember the beautiful words of St. John: "Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that when He shall appear we shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is."

How glorious it is to be assured that "the creation itself shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God". "According to His promise," says St. Peter, "we look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness." And St. John takes up the glad refrain: "God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain, for the former things have passed away."

All this we owe to the Lord Jesus, Who gave Himself for us even unto death, and that the death of the Cross, that He might put away our sin, and open the kingdom of heaven to all believers. How soon we may see Him face to face! A heavenly whisper thrills the very air about us, as the still, small voice of the spirit breathes into every believing heart the secret of His near approach. "Behold, I come quickly. Even so, come, Lord Jesus."

"Lo, as some venturer, from his stars receiving Promise and presage of sublime emprise,
Wears evermore the seal of his believing
Deep in the dark of solitary eyes,

So even I, and with a heart more burning,
So even I, and with a hope more sweet,
Groan for the hour, O Christ, of Thy returning,
Faint for the flaming of Thine Advent feet.

Hark, what a sound, and too Divine for hearing,
Stirs in the earth, and trembles in the air,
Is it the thunder of the Lord's Appearing?
Is it the music of His people's prayer?

Surely He cometh and a thousand voices
Shout to the Saints, and to the deaf are dumb;
Surely He cometh, and the earth rejoices,
Glad in His Coming, Who hath Sworn—I COME."

"UNITY"

Toleration, Yes; But No Compromise On the Truths and Principles of Our Holy Catholic Church.

One of the sweetest and most cherished traditions of the city of Richmond is "The Two Parsons", the affectionate, intimate friendship, and spiritual and social association of Parson J. Buchanan, of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and Parson J. D. Blair, of the Presbyterian Church. In Richmond's early days Shockoe Hill had no church building. The two parsons shared the hall of the House of Delegates at the State capital, conducting services there on alternate Sundays. The two congregations united cordially, all attending faithfully every Sunday. Incidentally, the Roman Catholics assembled in the Senate chamber of the same building, where a devout priest, expelled from France for allegiance to his faith, officiated regularly. Parson Buchanan, the Episcopalian, being unmarried, and having private income, invariably and insistently transferred all his wedding and other fees to Parson Blair, the Presbyterian, who had a large family and slender salary. They worked together for the saving of souls, the service of God and the advancement of mankind, illustrating by their lives and preaching the meaning of Christianity. They were real men, and real Christians, real believers; unobtrusive, yet dominant and purifying and elevating forces in a small community of powerful people. They stand out in memory here in vivid contrast to the recent ostentatious conference of the Church Unity League at New York and its absurd climax in collapse of loudly heralded arrangements for spectacular demonstration of Episcopal and Presbyterian "unity".

The Rev. Henry Sloan Coffin, ostensible Presbyterian and head of the ostensible theological seminary known as "Union", ostensibly non-sectarian, was advertised to administer the Holy Communion in St. George's Protestant Episcopal Church, New York City, of which the flambouyant Karl Reiland, of the resounding voice and rattling brain, is rector. Bishop Manning, Bishop of the Diocese, forbade the service. We may asume that this was delicious news to the League leaders. Newspapers had been rather neglectful and unmindful of them. Perhaps the action of the Bishop was foreseen, and he was purposely forced to become an agency of the publicity so dearly loved and passionately longed for by the average performer in "liberal" and "advanced" and "modernist" role. This suspicion is strengthened by consideration of the rules, canons and usages of the church, rector and vestry of a congregation offering a building for consecration, and required to sign a regular declaration. This says the building is hereby appropriated and devoted to the "worship and service of Almighty God, the Father, the Son and the Holy Ghost, according to the provisions of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America, in its ministry, doctrine, discipline, liturgy, rites and usages, and by a congregation in communion with said Church and in union with the convention thereof in the Diocese of—

"And we do also hereby request the Right Reverend ————, Bishop of the Diocese, to take the said building under his spiritual jurisdiction. And we do, moreover, hereby relinquish all claim to any right of disposing of the said building, or allowing the use of it in any way inconsistent with the terms of true meaning of this instrument of donation."

That is conveyance of control and direction, airtight as language can make.

On receipt of the Bishop's message the comedy element developed fully.

According to the New York Times of November 15, a "round robin" of protest was signed by thirteen Episcopal clergymen, members of the League. The "round robin" is the traditional method of intending mutineers, complaining to the captain of the ship, and is used to protect each signer from accusation of being leader. There is occasion for pondering and wondering why the fiery insurgents failed to go on, with methods related in Stevenson's "Treasure Island" and forward to the Bishop a circular bit cut from a Bible leaf and covered with ink, or soot, as the fatal "black spot", token of decreed doom. Perhaps the published hint of legal proceedings to force submission to administrations by the Rev. Henry Sloan Coffin in St. George's was regarded as equivalent to "the black spot", but no attempt at such proceedings was made. Maybe Mr. R. Fulton Cutting, astute financier and warden of St. George's vestry, advised that the consecration agreement probably would be held valid by any court. The demonstration was a thrilling success, however. It obtained for the neglected League several columns of publicity with the names and official connections of the thirteen valiant signers all correctly and gloriously in print. But two of the heroes are in Bishop Manning's Diocese. Neither expressed indignation by resignation. They still hold their jobs. Of the other eleven, one is the Rev. Guy Shipler, of the New York Churchman, whose clownish coarseness and irreverence in behalf of "modernism" has been marked now and then in the Southern Churchman. Another is the Rev. Mr. Opie, of North Carolina—one of the two signers of this new declaration of independence going from the Southern "Bible Belt". Mr. Opie is a veteran martyr. Reporters were informed that a year ago, at the Baltimore conference, he was forbidden by Bishop Murray to unite in a communion service with ministers of other denominations.

Much like little boys playing pirate, the doughty mutineer proclaimers of revolt and ferocious vengeance parade and are paraded—bold buccaneers riding dauntlessly the seething waves of a teapot tempest, fancying their squeaky shrieks to be reverberating roars, brandishing their laths in firm belief that they are death-dealing and revolutionizing broadswords.

Progress towards Christian unity is being made slowly, according to our standards, but surely, by influence of the Christian spirit, which is glorified and purified and consecrated common sense. Those who consider back a few years realize how fast and completely old enmities, jealousies, rivalries, among the denominations have vanished. As has happened many times, the powers of hell are made to serve heaven in this respect because every boastful claim or show of strength by foes of religion open or "boring from within" drives friends and defenders of religion to fellowship and new cooperation of effort.

Contrast our two parsons here—Parson Buchanan, the Episcopalian, and Parson Blair, the Presbyterian—with two modernist notoriety seekers, Guy Shipler and the Rev. Henry Sloan Coffin, for instance. Observe the difference between sincere service and mere noise, reality and sham, work that lives yet, after more than a hundred years and will live forever, and showy, self-flaunting froth, that vanishes in a twinkling of an eye. Notice the difference between two humble, self-abasing, self-denying followers of our Saviour, Parson Blair and Parson Buchanan, and the sounding brass and tinkling cymbals of the thirteen modernists, who go into another's Diocese and with bad manners urge resistance against a Bishop governing his Diocese as his conscience dictates.

The suggestion of the thirteen unlucky members of the signers of a cross-eyed Protestant Episcopal declaration of independence to resort to litigation for right to celebrate in St. George's Church, New York, the sacrament of our blessed Saviour's last supper, is violently repugnant and abhorrent, in our opinion, to all the most refined principles of our Church aside from any question of decency, gentility and good taste.

We strongly urge the unlucky thirteen to lead a "back to the farm" movement. We cannot expect crude blacksmiths to mend watches nor the unlucky thirteen violators of the first principles of refinement and gentility to bring unity in our spiritual realm. Don't answer the call to the ministry when our Lord calls some one else.

The New Conference Year

By Remsen B. Ogilby.

Once more Dr. Drury, of St. Paul's School, has challenged the attention of the young men of the Church. Twice in recent years he has placed all the resources of his great school at the disposal of a group of the clergy, who under his leadership held conferences on the ministry for some hundreds of schoolboys. The results of those conferences are being felt by the Church: it is a pleasure to be greeted by a young man at a theological seminary with: "O yes; I met you five years ago at the conference at St. Paul's School!"

Now comes another such opportunity, this time for college men. Arrangements have been made for a conference to be held at St. Paul's School, Concord, N. H., early in January from the third to the sixth. This will mean skating on the school pond instead of the swimming enjoyed at the other June conferences, and skiing instead of tennis. But the chief difference will be that this time the invitation is to students at college rather than selected schoolboys.

For a young man to decide early in his college course that he wants to go into business, pursuing that aim and selecting his courses with his ultimate commercial environment always in mind—that is rather fine. He will enter business well prepared. But to have a group of college seniors drift into business because they do not know what else to do—that is pathetic. A college student should choose his career for himself, in accordance with his desires and his qualifications, all being considered in the light of expert advice.

It is good, therefore, that these arrangements have been made for a presentation of the ministry to a selected group of college students under circumstances which will enable them to give the demands of that profession reasoned consideration. One of the guiding principles of the earlier conferences on the ministry for schoolboys at Concord was that the case for the ministry was to be put before the boys along purely objective lines; it was definitely stated in the invitations to the conferences that no appeal would be made to the young men to offer themselves for service, and no such offer if made would be accepted. Such is the spirit of this coming conference, which insures the fact that the sessions will be sane and well-balanced. The list of leaders includes four laymen, among them Dr. Grenfell, as well as Bishop Dallas. Educators are represented by Dr. Drury and Father Sill, with others from the ranks of the parish clergy.

He would indeed be a narrow-minded collegian who would not welcome an invitation to meet with this group at St. Paul's School to discuss the ministry. It is a rare opportunity. Whether or not it will result in the addition of young men of promise and capability to the ranks of those who are studying for Holy Orders, it is certain to bring about a clearer understanding of the work of the Church among the potential leaders of the coming generation:

The Conference Committee follows: Dr. Drury, chairman; Bishop Dallas, Dr. Wilfred Grenfell, Rev. A. Herbert Gray, Rev. Henry Hobson, Rev. Remsen Ogilby, Rev. F. H. Sill, O. H. C., Dean Sturges, Mr. Felix DuPont, President Kenneth Sills, Mr. Coleman Jennings, Mr. Harper Sibley, and Rev. C. Leslie Glenn, Secretary.

I SHINE IN THE LIGHT OF GOD.

I shine in the light of God,
His likeness stamps my brow,
Through the shadow of death my feet have trod
And I reign in glory now.
No breaking heart is here,
No keen and thrilling pain,
No wasted cheek, where the frequent tear
Hath rolled, and left its stain.

I have found the joy of heaven,
I am one of the angel band,
To my head a crown is given,
And a harp is in my hand.
I have learned the song they sing
Whom Jesus hath made free,
And the glorious walls of heaven still ring
With my new-born melody.

No sin, no grief, no pain,
Safe in my happy home,
My fears all fled, my doubts all slain,
My hour of triumph come!
O friends of my mortal years,
The trusted and the true!
You are walking still in the vail of tears,
But I want to welcome you.

Do I forget? Oh! No!
For memory's golden chain
Shall bind my heart to the hearts below,
Till they meet and touch again.
Each link is strong and bright,
And Love's electric flame
Flows freely down like a river of light,
To the world from whence it came.

Do you mourn when another star
Shines out from the glittering sky?
Do you weep when the noise of war
And the rage of conflict die?
Then why should your tears roll down
And your heart with grief be riven?
For another gem in the Saviour's crown
And another soul in heaven?

SHOWING WHAT ONE MAN CAN DO.

"Andrew * * * first findeth his own brother Simon, and saith unto him, We have found the Messias."—For a St. Andrew's Day message the following brief, inspiring article we reprint from the last issue of "St Andrew's Cross":

To talk with a Brotherhood man who has brought over one hundred new pupils into the Sunday schools of his town within a year, was the thrilling experience which came to me recently. We sat at dinner, this man and myself, for an hour; then we toured the town in his car and we passed another hour in his business office.

Mr. V. Ward Boswell is a member of historic old Christ Church of Alexandria, Va., and Director of Christ Church Chapter of the Brotherhood.

He teaches a class of boys in Sunday school and assists any minister of his community who calls on him for a special talk or service.

During the summer months Mr. Boswell has charge of two rural churches, also taking the superintendency of the Sunday school at one of these places; but his outstanding work is among the children of Alexandria. Discovering for himself that a large number of the children of his city were attending no Sunday school, he set himself the task of bringing as many as possible under the Christian teaching of the Church.

Wherever he comes in contact with a child, whether as a messenger sent to his office or in one of the homes to which his business calls him, he inquires as to whether that child is attending any Sunday school. Many times he stops and talks to children on the street, asking the same question, and a point of contact having been made with an ice cream cone or an apple, they are willing to accept this stranger as a friend and discuss the subject with him.

Where he ascertains that a child is outside of Sunday school (which is more frequently the case than would be ordinarily supposed), he calls upon the child's parents and finds them in practically all cases perfectly willing that their children should attend when invited in this way.

Where poverty in the home is so great that the children have not sufficient clothes, Mr. Boswell calls to his help some of the women of his church and between them the children are outfitted with necessary clothes and shoes; and where a child is shy about coming to the school alone, Mr. Boswell, with a generous use of his automobile, calls for him the first Sunday morning and sees that he is introduced to the superintendent and placed in a class.

In this way Mr. Boswell in eight months has increased his own Sunday school from 200 to 240 and has put 100 other children in touch with their own denominations.

In my ride with Mr. Boswell after dinner we visited a number of homes, and in that way I had an opportunity to observe another side of the work.

In one family there was a boy who had been sent to Richmond, where much needed braces were made, and at another home I saw children who through Mr. Boswell's instrumentality in interesting a local surgeon, had a necessary tonsils operation.

And so the work goes on—a work so simple in its method that it can be adopted by any consecrated member of the Brotherhood, and so far-reaching in its effects spiritually and physically that never till the end of time can the good accomplished be estimated.

BIBLE QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

(Our readers are invited to send in their questions from time to time concerning Scriptural subjects in which they are perplexed or desire light. Our limited space necessitates brevity in questions, as well as in the answers which we will endeavor to maintain in strict accord with the Word of the Lord, which, after all, settles all argument. This column is therefore not for controversy, but for a testimony.)

Question No. 9—"Please explain Heb. 9:28. The Southern Churchman has been a great help to me in my great sorrow."—Mrs. A. C. G.

Answer—Heb. 9:28 embraces a view of both advents, and as we see by the first word, "So" is a summary as it were of the entire chapter which should be carefully read.

Our Lord came first to deal with the "sin question", and when He comes again, and which event will mark the close of this present "age of grace", it will not be to deal with the "believer's sins", that matter having already been settled at Calvary, Heb. 9:12. It will be the final act of assembling "believers" to be with him in the place he has gone to prepare, the word "salvation" here being in its inclusive sense, involving final deliverance from "this present world". We will understand this and other passages better, to remember that "salvation" is in three tenses, i. e.:

(1) Already saved from penalty of sin—John 5:24.

(2) Being saved from sin's dominion—Rom. 6:14.

(3) Final deliverance from the presence of sin, and conforming to the likeness of Christ—Heb. 10:36; 1 Peter 1:5; 1 Jno. 3:2.

As to this applying to those "that look for him", it is manifest that all true "believers" should be living in that "blessed hope"—Jno. 14:2-3; Titus 2:11-13; 1 Thess. 4:13 to 18.

Question 10—"Are there 'evil angels' as well as 'good'."—Mrs. R. T. I.

Answer—Yes, there are angels of God and angels of Satan; holy angels and fallen angels (see Matt. 25:41; Eph. 6:12; Jude 6:7). The angels of God are so numerous as to be referred to as "the heavenly hosts that cannot be numbered", Heb. 12:22. Their purpose is to minister the Divine will, Acts 8:26, although their visible ministry in past ages has been superseded in this present "church age" by the Holy Spirit within. The Holy Scripture affords many glimpses of these wonderful creatures as to their character and attributes. There are also illuminating books on the subject.

WESTMINSTER THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY

By the Reverend J. Gresham Machen, D. D., Litt. D.

(Reprinted from "The Presbyterian".)

(Continuation of address delivered at the opening of Westminster Seminary in Witherspoon Hall, Philadelphia, on Wednesday afternoon, September 25, 1929.)

BUT Biblical theology is not all the theology that will be taught at Westminster Seminary; for systematic theology will be at the very centre of the Seminary's course. At that point an error should be avoided: it must not be thought that systematic theology is one whit less Biblical than Biblical theology is. But it differs from Biblical theology in that, standing on the foundation of Biblical theology, it seeks to set forth, no longer in the order of the time when it was revealed, but in the order of logical relationships, the grand sum of what God has told us in His Word. There are those who think that systematic theology on the basis of the Bible is impossible; there are those who think that the Bible contains a mere record of human seeking after God and that its teachings are a mass of contradiction which can never be resolved. But to the number of those persons we do not belong. We believe for our part that God has spoken to us in His Word, and that He has given us not merely theology, but a system of theology, a great logically consistent body of truth.

That system of theology, that body of truth, which we find in the Bible, is the Reformed Faith, the Faith commonly called Calvinistic, which is set forth so gloriously in the Confession and Catechisms of the Presbyterian Church. It is sometimes referred to as a "man-made creed". But we do not regard it as such. We regard it, in accordance with our ordination pledge as ministers in the Presbyterian Church, as the creed which God has taught us in His Word. If it is contrary to the Bible, it is false. But we hold, that it is not contrary to the Bible, but in accordance with the Bible, and true. We rejoice in the approximations to that body of truth which other systems of theology contain; we rejoice in our Christian fellowship with other evangelical churches; we hope that members of other churches, despite our Calvinism, may be willing to enter into Westminster Seminary as students and to listen to what we may have to say. But we cannot consent to impoverish our message by setting forth less than what we find the Scriptures to contain; and we believe that we shall best serve our fellow-Christians, from whatever church they may come, if we set forth not some vague greatest common measure among various creeds, but that great historic Faith that has come through Augustine and Calvin to our own Presbyterian Church. Glorious is the heritage of the Reformed Faith. God grant that it may go forth to new triumphs even in the present time of unbelief!

Systematic theology, on the basis of Holy Scripture, is the very centre of what we have to teach; every other theological department is contributory to that; that department gives a man the message that he has to proclaim. But we have already spoken of the heritage of the Reformed Faith, and of a glorious tradition that has come down to us in the church. And that brings us to speak of another department of the theological curriculum, the department that deals with the history of the Christian Church. Our message is based, indeed, directly upon the Bible; we derive the content of it not from the experience of past ages, but from what God has told us in His Word. But it would be a mistake to ignore what past generations, on the basis of God's Word, have thought and said and done. Into many other fields of theological study the study of church history casts a beneficent light. Church history should make us less enthusiastic about a modernity which is really as old as the hills; and amid the difficulties of the present time it should give us new hope. God has brought His Church through many perils, and the darkest hour has often preceded the dawn. So it may be in our day. The gospel may yet break forth, sooner than we expect, to bring light and liberty to mankind. But that will be done, unless the lesson of church history is altogether wrong, by the instrumentality, not of theological pacifists who avoid controversy, but of earnest contenders for the faith. God gives us men in our time who will stand with Luther and say: "Here I stand, I cannot do otherwise, God help me. Amen."

Thus the minister who goes forth from Westminster Seminary will, we hope, be a man with a message. He will also, we hope, be a man who can so deliver his message as to reach the hearts and minds of men; and to help him do that, the department of homiletics and practical theology has an important place. It cannot, indeed, itself teach a man how to preach; that he must learn, if at all, by the long experience of subsequent years. But at least it can help him to avoid errors and can start him in the right way; it can start him out in that long course in homiletics which is provided by all the rest of life.

Such, very feebly and imperfectly presented, is the program of Westminster Theological Seminary; it is far better set forth in the fine article which Dr. Oswald T. Allis has recently contributed to The Sunday School Times. Many things are omitted from this brief summary of ours. Some of them are omitted because of the imperfections of the speaker or from lack of time. But others are omitted of deliberate purpose. There are many things—many useful things, too—with which a theological seminary should not attempt to deal. Let it never be forgotten that a theological seminary is a school for specialists. We are living in an age of specialization. There are specialists on eyes and specialists on noses, and throats, and stomachs, and feet, and skin; there are specialists on teeth—one set of specialists on putting teeth in, and another set of specialists on pulling teeth out—there are specialists on Shakespeare and specialists on electric wires; there are specialists on Plato and specialists on pipes. Amid all these specialities, we at Westminster Seminary have a specialty which we think, in comparison with these others, is not so very small. Our specialty is found in the Word of God. Specialists in the Bible—that is what Westminster Seminary will endeavor to produce. Please do not forget it; please do not call on us for a product that we are not endeavoring to provide. If you want specialists in social science or in hygiene or even in "religion" (in the vague modern sense), then you must go elsewhere for what you want. But if you want men who know the Bible and know it in something more than a layman's sort of way, then call on us. If we can give you such men, we have succeeded; if we cannot give them to you, we have failed. It is a large contract indeed, a contract far too great for human strength. But at least, by God's grace, we shall do our best.

Such is the task of Westminster Theological Seminary. It is a task that needs especially to be undertaken at the present time. Fifty years ago many colleges and universities and theological seminaries were devoted to the truth of God's Word. But one by one they have drifted away, often with all sorts of professions of orthodoxy on the part of those who were responsible for the change. Until May, 1929, one great theological seminary, the Seminary at Princeton, resisted bravely the current of the age. But now that seminary has been made to conform to the general drift. Signers of the Auburn Affirmation, a formal document which declares that acceptance of the Virgin Birth and of four other basic articles of the Christian faith is nonessential even for ministers, actually sit upon the new governing Board. And they do so apparently with the acquiescence of the rest. Not one word of protest against the outrage involved in their presence has been uttered, so far as I know, by the other members of the Board; and a formal pronouncement, signed by the President of the Seminary and the President of the Board, actually commends the thirty-three members of the Board as men who have the confidence of the church. Surely it is quite clear, in view of that pronouncement, as well as in view of the personnel of the Board, that under such a governing body, Princeton Seminary is lost to the evangelical cause.

At first sight it might seem to be a great calamity; and sad are the hearts of those Christian men and women throughout the world who love the gospel that the old Princeton proclaimed. We cannot fully understand the ways of God in permitting so great a wrong. Yet good may come even out of a thing so evil as that. Perhaps the evangelical people in the Presbyterian Church were too contented, too confident in material resources; perhaps God has taken away worldly props in order that we may rely more fully upon Him; perhaps the pathway of sacrifice may prove to be the pathway of power.

That pathway of sacrifice is the pathway which students and supporters of Westminster Seminary are called upon to tread. For that we can thank God. Because of the sacrifices involved, no doubt many have been deterred from coming to us; they have feared the opposition of the machinery of the church; some of them may have feared, perhaps, to bear fully the reproach of Christ. We do not judge them. But whatever may be said about the students who have not come to us, one thing can certainly be said about those who have come—they are real men.

No, my friends, though Princeton Seminary is dead, the noble tradition of Princeton Seminary is alive. Westminster Seminary will endeavor by God's grace to continue that tradition unimpaired; it will endeavor, not on a foundation of equivocation and compromise, but on an honest foundation of devotion to God's Word, to maintain the same principles that the old Princeton maintained. We believe, first, that the Christian religion, as it is set forth in the Confession of Faith of the Presbyterian Church, is true; we believe, second, that the Christian religion welcomes and is capable of scholarly defense; and we believe, third, that the Christian religion should be proclaimed without fear or favor, and in clear opposition to whatever opposes it, whether within or without the church, as the only way of salvation for lost mankind. On that platform, brethren, we stand. Pray that we may be enabled by God's Spirit to stand firm. Pray that the students who go forth from Westminster Seminary way know Christ as their own Saviour and may proclaim to others the gospel of His love.

FAVORITE SCRIPTURE VERSE.

(In this space each week will appear a favorite passage of Scripture as sent in by a different reader. Every one is, therefore, invited to send us their favorite verse. It is suggested all who can, join with the rest of us in committing to memory the verse which appears here each week, including its location in the Holy Book; and in due time your memory chest will be laden with choice, eternal treasures, indeed. "Thy word have I hid in my heart, that I might not sin against thee," Ps. 119:11.)

This week the following verse was submitted by

Mr. Lawrence Hopkins Reed, of Litchfield, Conn.: "I will not leave you comfortless: I will come to you."—St. John. 14:18.

Who will send one from the far-away places as well as very near us?

IMPORTANT PUBLICATION.

Dr. Dyson Hague writes us that he is confident that thousands of American Churchmen who have been helped by the writings of the late Dr. Griffith Thomas will be glad to hear that a monumental work of his (The Principles of Theology, an Exposition of the Thirty-Nine Articles) is to be published next month and will be on sale in the United States by the Publishers, Longmans, Green and Company, New York, Chicago and Boston. It is really a wonderful work and will constitute a complete armory for the Churchman of today, ministerial, student, or lay. It covers in a most comprehensive way the whole field of Anglican Church teaching, for there is scarcely a subject pertaining to the doctrine of our Church that is not exhaustively and conclusively treated. It will be an Anglican encyclopedia. He is sure that all the readers of The Southern Churchman will be interested in this great publication so specially needed today.

Book Reviews

THE COMING PRINCE: By Sir Robert Anderson. Cloth, crown octavo; pp. 311. Published by Pickering & Inglis, London, England. Price 3/6.

This is the twelfth edition of this widely read book. It challenges study. For it revolves around the prophecy of Daniel concerning our Lord and the seventy weeks, ere the close of which the Anti-Christ will have been manifested.

The reader will be most helped as he traces Sir Robert's contention as to the historicity and credibility of the book of Daniel. We grow weary and sad as the present-day writers dismiss Daniel as a romantic drama conceived in the second century before the Christian era. And so many recessions have been made by critics in the past that it were well for us to regard with attention and sympathy and erudition of a man who has spent the good part of a lifetime in the deep study of the authenticity of the prophecy.

We are impressed with the increasing interest in the matter of our Lord's coming by sincere believers. On the one hand the high-tide of Modernism sweeps it entirely off the stage; on the other, the deepening concern as to world conditions fitting accurately into the predicted mould of the latter times. There is no need to agonize as to the imminency of the event. When it comes He will move the hearts of His own with an impulse of expectancy that will be unmistakable. Others may stand in the strength of their own conclusions. He can do nothing for them. But it never should be, because it never is declared to be, a terror for those who "love His appearing".

Sir Robert inspires us with a fresh conviction of the truth, and refreshes our souls as we seek to accept "all the counsel of God".

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letters to the Editor" will appear in our columns except those coming to us signed by writer

TO VICTORY UNDER OUR BISHOPS, THE SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN AND OUR MISSIONARIES, LAY AND CLERICAL.

Mr. Editor:

Rally to the standard of the Southern Churchman and the Old Dominion of Virginia and the entire South will win a victory welcome to the people of the whole world.

The fire burns, but not so fiercely—it is stifled as yet with much smoke—who shall fan it?

Our clergy are working hard, but what causes the apathy? They cannot do the whole work.

Awake, men and women, help the Bishop, help the clergy; laymen are equally missionaries in the grand work before us.

Our Lord has called us to go forth, at least in desire, to the ends of the earth, and has set before us also the heavenly rewards for those working for His glory and the gain of souls. Let our cry be, give us souls. Daniel tells us our labor shall be fruitful to ourselves also. Those that teach others unto justice shall shine as the stars for all eternity. In the days when the whole world, when the primitive Christian Church, was the simple Episcopal Church of our own today an Iberian slave converted the whole Iberian nation!

How many other historical anecdotes might be narrated since the time of the apostles when for centuries Europe, nay the whole world, was entirely under our Episcopal form of government of the Christian Church, when bishops ruled their flocks under no subsequent domination of a pope—how many records show how simple laymen were the apostles under their superiors to many peoples! Let all of the Episcopalians of today return to their simple and infallible trust and belief in the divine inspiration of the Scriptures, and of their infallibility alone and what a fire will be enkindled in our breasts, each in the proper limits of his or her own place in the church, of his or her own capacity and learning, but each, even if only by the apostleship of prayer, like Moses on the mount, to gain a victory in winning both all men to Christianity back again, but also all our separated Christians, into one fold, not divided by merely accidental forms of church government, a thing first Christians at times varied in, although receiving our Episcopal form of government as left to us by the apostles. Each of us can be an apostle in his own walk of life, even an invalid an apostle by prayer. Let us repeat the same story o'er and o'er. Ye who have followed Me in the resurrection shall sit on twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel was spoken to apostolic laymen as well as to bishops and ministers.

Even great sinners like Magdalene were converted apostles; the dying thief preached from his cross.

Rally to the spiritual standard of the Southern Churchman!

It is to its able and persevering editors, supported by the apostolic Judge Marsilliot, we owe our Prayer Book, still unmutilated by convention changes and still retaining that platform of safe teachings and product of the Protestant Reformation, the Thirty-nine Articles, equally adverse to destructive Biblical criticism, modernism and the superstitious excesses of Greek, Roman and Anglo-Catholicism.

Beyond the limits imposed on us as Episcopalians by our Creed and Prayer Book we are free to work together to save souls, and in free matters no party can impose its own opinions on differing brethren. Episcopalian divines, English and American, Hooker, Jewel, Stillingfleet, Wesley, White and many others, declare for entire freedom in a variety of views, unassailable by any mutual recriminations, on such teachings as the nature of the Lord's Supper and Communion with Christ, on the meaning and necessity of Apostolic Succession and the essential forms of Ordination, the Thirty-nine Articles on these and other non-essential and useless wranglings wisely touching in words permitting that difference of opinion the early Christians never dreamed of discussing, nor allowing to disrupt their unbroken and united zeal to work together for the salvation of every child of Adam.

Let us, every minister and layman, under our devoted Bishop, go forward on the one platform of teaching toward which our Southern Churchman has been leading us.

No wonder too dazzling revelations of misunderstood science have allured some of our churchmen to sacrifice the truth of Scripture to it—their noble piety will surely imitate countless other wise men, who, like the great Augustine, retracted at the end of his life many rash teachings, including a laxity for divorce, his modernism likewise disappeared as others should before a present return of scientific thought that the same does exactly agree with old-time Bible faith.

The conservative faith of the Church of Virginia must yet enliven the charity, the zeal for souls to embrace all our separated churches to unity in time to come, in the revival of the first apostolic Episcopal Church. Behold the journey of our Bishop only yesterday with his missionaries through Virginia! How the Archdeacon of the Blue Ridge showed Episcopalians, under the jurisdiction of our Bishop, even did the work for abandoned congregations of Baptists or Methodists, and even accepted the assistance of their teachers in necessary catechetical work among the mountaineers! Behold the vision of what future unity for souls lies before us!

Has not our devoted Bishop told us his Japan of yore lies now before him in his Virginia of the present; nay, even to extend to the multitudes needing aid in all America, or in the words of our Bishop's missionary aide of the National Council from New York, the world alone must be the bounds of our undivided work. Apostles, all of us, of prayer at least, by pen, by tongue if able—all by mutual love, faith and work. What greater reward for all eternity than to have grasped the hand of a fellow-sinner about to slip over into the abyss.

But shall we, my brethren, be without a heavenly reward. One soul more in heaven would be enough! But Paul says the Just Judge would reward him for his long, long strife for Christ. As the angels ye shall be, and John shows us the ranks of the angelic choirs are to be refilled with men—among angels, still higher maybe, archangels—or shall it be, shall it be among the choir whom Hebrew scholars tell us, means "illuminated with light", the Cherubim, or maybe the highest of all Isaiah saw standing nearest the throne of God, the Seraphim, whose name interpreted is, "burning with love" (added to knowledge).

But to be the least in the kingdom of heaven, in rejoicing in the salvation of others, is a boon we would thank our heavenly Father, for the love of His only Son, Jesus Christ.

Church Intelligence

This Sunday.

This Sunday, December 1, 1929, is a significant day throughout the whole Church. It is Advent Sunday, the first day of the new Church year. It is the Sunday suggested by the late Bishop Murray as Presiding Bishop, for the introduction of the New Prayer Book. It is the day for most parishes to begin their Every Member Canvass, which is scheduled for December 1-15.

It is also the Sunday nearest St. Andrew's Day (November 30); and as we assume our duties for the New Year can we find a better example to follow than that of St. Andrew, of whom it is recorded: "He first findeth his own brother . . . and saith unto him, we have found the Christ. . . . He brought him to Jesus."

China Bulletin Number 61.

November 20.—To the relatives and friends of missionaries in Hankow, and to all China missionaries on furlough:

Recent press dispatches from China have stated that owing to the fighting in Honan, foreigners in Hankow were considering evacuation.

In answer to our cabled inquiry, Bishop Roots states that the report is incorrect and that the situation gives little cause for concern.

Sincerely yours,

John W. Wood.

GLEANINGS HERE AND THERE.

Rector for Five Generations: Although the Rev. F. M. Kirkus, of Trinity Parish, Wilmington, Delaware, is far from being an old man and has been rector of that parish but twenty-five years, he has had the unusual experience of ministering to five generations of the same family. Mrs. Lavinia Dorr, who died in 1914 aged ninety-four, left a daughter, Mrs. Joseph Swift, who, like herself, was a devout member of Trinity. She left a daughter, Mrs. Henry Lea Tatnall, mother of ten children, of whom eight have been confirmed in Trinity and four have been married there; and seven children of these four have been baptized in the church, making the fifth generation.

Gains in the Churches: Dr. H. K. Carroll, Director of the Religious Statistics of the United States Census, reports gain for Christian Churches in the country for the fiscal year 1928-29 of 1,115,000. This compares with gain of a little above half a million the year immediately preceding and is the largest gain since 1921, when the churches practically were stationary. The largest gains were of the fourteen Baptist divisions, including colored, 475,824, Roman Catholics being second, with 423,709. The sixteen Methodist bodies made poor showing, comparatively with gain of but 45,000, a decided decrease of gain from the year before. Totals for the thirty-two most important denominations show 46,471,248 members, which does not include Jews or other non-Christian organizations.

In contributions for religious purposes the Southern Baptists are last in the list of twenty-five bodies. Their total for the year is $40,038,000, or $10.62 per capita. In per capita giving the Northern Presbyterians lead all, $39.11, with total of $75,054,000, Episcopalians making a close second with $38.69 per capita, although their total is but $46,088,000. Southern Presbyterians gave $35.58 per capita, total of $15,826,000, and Northern Baptists $33,566,000, per capita of $23.76. Northern Methodists gave $98,000,000, or $24.81 per capita, and Southern Methodists less than half as much total and $16.70 per capita.

Archbishop Honors American Woman: In the Chapel of Lambeth Palace, London, recently, the Archbishop of London conferred the Lambeth diploma on Miss S. E. Clements, Ph.D., teacher of psychology at the National Cathedral School for Girls, Washington. She was one of seven recipients. Six Englishwomen were granted at the same time and place licenses to teach theology.

Circulation of Bibles: The British and Foreign Bible Society publishes a statement showing that in the one hundred and twenty-five years of its life it has issued over 397,000,000 volumes of the Holy Scriptures. Twenty-five years ago it was issuing at the rate of six hundred and fifty volumes an hour. Last year the issue was 1,301 volumes an hour.

Greatest Gifts In All History: According to figures compiled by Henry M. Robertson, gifts by John D. Rockefeller, for various religious and charitable purposes, in the last twenty years aggregate more than $525,000,000, which is five times as much as any other one person has given in the history of the world.

Christians Jubilant: Members of the Southern Convention of the Christian Church are jubilant over the showing of contributions for missions. In the year ended September 1, 1928, total contributions for that object were $38,500. For the year ended September, 1929, the figure is $45,282.

Baptist World Strength: Figures compiled by General Secretary Rushbrooke, of the Baptist World Alliance, give the total membership of all branches of the Baptist denomination in the world, excluding Russia, at 10,052,727 and total of Sunday-school scholars at 6,515,856. Of the total church memberships 8,835,000 are in North America and 640,642 in Europe. For Australia and New Zealand church memberships are but 33,797, while Sunday-school scholars number over 43,000.

Memorial windows in honor of the late Bishop Brent and General Leonard Wood are being placed in the Protestant Episcopal Cathedral at Manila.

Two Chinese Bishops have been consecrated by Bishop Roots to be assistants to Bishop Mowll in the Diocese of Szechuen.

Church Papers Losing: Of the seventeen Baptist papers reporting to the recent Southern Baptist Convention, five told of unchanged circulation, five of gains, seven of losses ranging from slight to severe, the net loss for the seventeen in the year 1928 being 3,178.

Oldest Churchman: Richard Evans, near Stubensville, Ohio, who celebrated his hundredth birthday in June, was said to be the oldest member of the Protestant Episcopal Church in this country. He was born in England and came to the United States in 1858, became a notably successful farmer and retired with comfortable competence years ago. He is an accomplished musician, was musical director of his church and served through the War Between the States in the Federal Army as fifer for his regiment. He dislikes automobiles and the movies and refuses to patronize either, but confesses to longing for a ride in an airplane and is a voracious reader of magazines and newspapers.

A Loving Congregation: When the Rev. Charles Collins, of Hot Springs, Arkansas, suffered serious and threatening illness he and his family literally were deluged with gifts and flowers, fruits and delicacies and members of his congregation and others of the community united in contributing a substantial money gift with which he was enabled to go to Corpus Christi, Texas, recommended by his physicians as the place with climate most likely to assure his return to health.

Seven of the boys of the Cathedral at Dallas, Texas, are preparing for the ministry.

Bishop Wilson, of Eau Claire, Wisconsin, and Miss Hall, of Evanston, were married November 15, Presiding Bishop Anderson, of Chicago, officiating.

Prof. Henry Spooner, of London, calculates that this year is the three thousand and five hundredth from the birth of Moses.

One of the most obscure and remarkable revivals of history has been completed recently by William Harris, Christian missionary, Negro, known as "The Black Prophet", among the heathen negroes on the Ivory Coast of Africa. He is said to have received and baptized, within a few months, from 60,000 to 100,000 converts to Christianity.

Church Unity Abroad: Foreign religious exchanges continue to tell of movements for unity of Christian Churches. The Church of England, Methodist and South India United Churches have held protracted conferences at Madras, India, and agreed on a draft for union, to be submitted to the respective Church authorities. At Newcastle, England, Archbishop Soderblom, of Upsala, on his way to Scotland to address the Scottish Church assemblies, was welcomed cordially by the Bishop of Newcastle and the meeting he addressed was attended by representatives of all the non-conformist congrégations and Quakers and the Salvation Army. Archbishop Soderblom speaks for the Baltic Churches Conference and the World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship Through the Churches. He gave vivid descriptions of the first conference at Constance, in 1914, and of that more recently held at Stockholm, 1926.

All branches of the Methodist Church in Great Britain have agreed on a plan for unity among themselves and the Church of Scotland and United Free Church, branches of the Presbyterians, also have agreed on union.

Another indication of the growing spirit of fellowship is given by the dedication by Prof. Carnegie Simpson, strong Presbyterian, of Westminster College, Cambridge, England, of his book, "The Church and the State" to Archbishop Davidson, Lord Davidson of Lambeth, primate of the Established Church, "A great servant of the Church and the State".

On the same subject in this country, the advantages of unity of faith and ritual illustrated by the Roman Catholic Church are pointed out in a survey of the city of Chicago, where the Catholics have two hundred and fifty-three parishes with average membership of 2,250 and Protestants 1,000 parishes with average membership of less than two hundred. It is shown that many Protestant churches have been forced to retreat before advances of business in former residential sections, while but two Catholic churches have found removal necessary.

Huguenot Evangelical Society.

The following report from Rev. Paul Perret to the Huguenot Evangelical Society was read at a meeting of that society in Richmond, Va., on November seventeenth.

Maubeuge, France, Oct. 3, 1929.

Dear Madam:

I beg you to transmit to the members of your society the expression of our gratitude for their work which assures the support of the pastor at Maubeuge. I am still alone as pastor. During the summer we had the assistance of a young Swiss pastor. We would have been glad to keep him with us, but he was called to a church in his own country. The evangelist, Miss Richez, was helped for six months by a young girl from LaRochelle, whom we valued very highly, but she was not able to stay longer. She had a real talent for music, which was often useful. As in other years, Madame Perret has done what she could in the work of the parish. The year 1928 was a bad one for her, as she was an invalid for five months. The year 1929 has been a better one. Her help in directing the church choir and in the mothers' meetings has been most valuable. In spite of the lack of a second pastor, our work is maintained, and has made progress in certain points. A young officer, the son of a pastor, put himself at our service in directing our Boy Scouts.. He worked with us with much enthusiasm and competence. Another officer uses his free time for our Men's Society. During the winter he will hold several conferences on scientific and social subjects. Among our young girls we have some students who have a good influence over the young workmen whom they meet. The members of our Anti-Alcoholic League, in trying to fill the lack of a second pastor, have worked hard, and have helped in the reformation of several drunkards. One can then say that which characterized the year just passed was the activity of the members of the community in their effort to take the place of the second pastor. Since we do not know when we can have another, pastors being very few in number, we will continue to use largely the aid of lay members. We long, however, to advance more than it is possible for us to do. It is important that we should have a permanent mission in Hautmont, which has 1,300 inhabitants and is a center of moral depravity and of alcoholism. We are prevented by the lack of a meeting place. We have hoped for several years to have the necessary funds for buying a house, but our hope is not yet satisfied. We know that we could easily have a Sunday school there and regular services. Many people come in touch with our work of evangelization for just a few weeks, or months. We ask ourselves sometimes of what use is this slight contact, but during the past year several men who were with us ten or twenty years ago have returned and again taken their places among us. So we conclude that we should never be weary in sowing, that the seed will come up, even though we know not of it. This is the substance of what I wish to report. I hope that this letter may arrive in time for your annual meeting. I would like to have written sooner, but we have been having a regional evangelistic conference for which I was responsible. For more than two months my time has been given to organizing it. My wife joins me in sending the expression of our best wishes.

PAUL PERRET.

Maubeuge, in Northern France, is the center of the mission, covering forty preaching places of which our pastor is the head.

The Huguenot Evangelical Society is interdenominational. Rev. William E. Hill is the president and Miss Kate Fontaine Meade chairman of the Executive Committee. General membership is $1 a year. The sustaining memberships of $5 or $10 or more a year are absolutely necessary in order to raise the $520 which we send. The treasurer is Mrs. J. B. Halyburton, 1628 Park Avenue, Richmond, Va. We ask your aid in this important field of work for our Master.

A Christmas Gift Suggestion.

The very attractive little 1930 Alaskan Churchman Calendar, with its bright red and gold cover and its interesting photographs of the missions in Alaska is now ready for distribution. The Feast Days of the Church Year are all clearly marked.

It is published in a limited edition, and will be sent, postpaid, for fifty cents as long as the edition lasts. Address: The Alaskan Churchman, Box 6, Haverford, Pennsylvania.

The fine thing about sending this Calendar to bring Christmas cheer to a friend is that at the same time you are helping Alaskan Missions. After the expenses of the publication have been met, any profits are forwarded to Alaska for Bishop Rowe and his work.

Rector Publicly Repeats Ordination Vows.

The secular press of East Liverpool, Ohio, carries the following account:

The spectacle of the rector, the Rev. R. K. Caulk, in the absence of the bishop, reading to himself the vows of ordination which, qualifying him as minister and priest, he had taken some twenty-seven years ago and to the interrogations giving again affirmative replies, was presented at the mission in St. Stephen's Church, East Liverpool, Ohio, following a sermon by Captain B. H. Mountford, missioner, of New York City, last Thursday night, November 21.

He met with out qualification the suggestion of Captain Mountford that, as the leader of his people in the parish, he lead them in a departure which they were expected to follow.

"I meet the challenge promptly," declared the rector. "I am glad to do that which all of us at intervals should do." He told of having accompanied Captain Mountford and his assistants, Captain W. E. F. Bugg and Cadet W. H. Cochran, to the Diamond and there witnessing upon the streets for the first time in his life for the Master whom he serves in a pastoral capacity. "Like many of you I can declare I was not used to such a departure," he observed.

He then assumed his place at the altar and led the congregation in an ordination hymn, following which he stood before the assembled multitude and read question after question to himself to which again he replied.

Then, when Captain Mountford suggested that vestrymen, wardens, choir members and others of the congregation come forward and procure cards similar to that which the rector had taken for later signature to an agreement for added loyalty to Christ, they went forward while all sang "Onward Christian Soldiers".

"Your action in openly witnessing for Christ by taking these cards for later signing suggests to me the assertion," said Captain Mountford: 'I have opened my mouth to the Lord and can not go back'.

"If you confess that Jesus is Christ you will grow; if you deny Him you will shrivel," he had previously said in his discourse.

Bishop's Condition Reported Serious.

The beloved Bishop of Southern Virginia, the Rt. Rev. Beverley Dandridge Tucker, D. D., is in a very serious condition, according to latest reports. On the thirtieth of October he suffered a fall on the steps of his home in Norfolk. He was taken immediately to the hospital and has been there ever since. Three fractured ribs sustained in the fall seem to be mending satisfactorily, but an extreme weakness, causes the greatest hindrance to the bishop's recovery. His son, the Rt. Rev. Henry St. George Tucker, D. D., Bishop of Virginia, has been constantly at his bedside for the past few days, but was expected to return to Richmond on Tuesday.

Dr. Reiland Is Criticised.

The New York Times has been very generous in the space allotted to the Christian Unity Conference in New York. In the following article it quotes extensively from the most recent editorial in The Living Church:

An "indignity" was offered to the Rev. Dr. Henry Sloane Coffin, a Presbyterian and President of Union Theological Seminary by the Rev. Dr. Karl Reiland, rector of St. George's Protestant Episcopal Church, New York City, when the latter invited the former to officiate at a service of Holy Communion in St. George's, according to the current issue of The Living Church, a Protestant Episcopal weekly published in Milwaukee. This service was to have been the closing session of the New York Conference of the Christian Unity League, which lasted three days. When Bishop Manning "admonished" Dr. Reiland and the vestry of St. George's not to let Dr. Coffin officiate, the service was transferred on invitation of Dr. Coffin to the Chapel of Union Seminary. The editorial also criticises the Rev. Dr. Peter Ainslie, of Baltimore, President of the League.

"When the rector of St. George's, by any sort of reasoning, deemed it useful to invite a Presbyterian minister to celebrate the Holy Communion in his church, well knowing that his Bishop would probably disapprove, and that his own sole right to deliver the invitation was at least open to question," says the editorial, "it appears to us that he offered an indignity to that minister, who would naturally assume that the priest was within his legal rights in giving the invitations and Dr. Coffin's letter clearly indicates that he felt the same.

"Moreover Sir Henry Lunne's 'protest' against forcing from without a change in the official policy of any church as being in any sense a step toward unity, shows that Dr. Ainslie and Dr. Reiland, in adopting this policy of force, cannot speak for Protestants generally or assume that this attempt to break down the law of the Episcopal Church has the sanction of the great mass of Christian people.

"Bishop Manning was bound to meet the issue when it was raised and he did so nobly.

"That the conference drew only a very small number evidently indicated that the Protestant world will follow the lead of Sir Henry Lunn rather than that of Dr. Ainslie and his associates and that they will not support these latter in their attempt to break down the discipline of the Episcopal Church, as though this were or should be a step towards unity.

"We have honored Dr. Ainslie for his leadership toward that end, but we cannot feel that in his latest policies he is doing justice to himself or to the cause that has so long been his chief interest. And for those of our own clergy who are willing to repudiate the position of the Church of the Ages in so vital a manner, we can only hope that the outcome of this unhappy incident will be a warn to them; while we trust that Protestant ministers in general will be on their guard so that they may not be placed in so compromising a position by accepting any invitations from clergymen who may in future tender invitations tha they are not in a position to fulfil with out breaking completely with their ecclesiastical superiors."

Continues Mrs. Burleson's Work.

Bishop Burleson wishes to announce that in order to meet the many requests from persons interested in the illuminated cards which were the work of Mrs. Helen Burleson, the designs drawn by her have been placed with Mrs. C. S. Pomeroy, 1436 Fourth Street, Riverside, California, who will be glad to furnish the cards, illuminated, to any who desire. A list of subjects and prices may be obtained on application.

A Bishop's Message to His Clergy.

The Bishop of Virginia writes to all his clergy: "If in any church the pledges made in the Every Member Canvass are not sufficient to enable the whole quota to be subscribed, let that fact be reported back to the congregation. Thus an opportunity will be given, to those who are interested and who are able to do more than they have pledged, to contribute towards making up the deficiency."

Thanking his clergy for their cooperation in the effort to arouse renewed interest in the missionary work of the Church, the Bishop says: "There does seem to be a widespread determination that next year Virginia shall do its full part. . . . May the love of Him who gave His Son that we might be saved fill our hearts. If this work is God's will, let us undertake it in the belief that we can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth us."

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., Bishop

The Union Thanksgiving Services for all Protestant Churches in Georgetown were planned to be held in the West Washington Baptist Church on Thanksgiving Day at 10:30 A. M. Ministers of all the churches had some part in the service, if only announcing a hymn and the sermon was preached by the Rev. Thomas K. Nelson, D. D., of the Virginia Theological Seminary. Music of the service was rendered by the choir of Dumbarton Avenue M. E. Church. All three Episcopal churches in Georgetown participated in the service, and their rectors were listed on the service program. These union services have been held in Georgetown for several years now, and have proven most helpful and successful.

The Woman's Auxiliary of the Diocese of Washington will hold its annual memorial anniversary service on Saturday, November 30, in Washington Cathedral, beginning with a celebration of the Holy Communion at eleven o'clock.

The Bishop of Washington was to be the preacher at the Festival Thanksgiving Service on Thanksgiving Day at Washington Cathedral at 11 A. M. Later in the day he expected to leave for New Orleans, Louisiana, where he will preach on December 1 in Trinity Church. He will also address several meetings on Monday and Tuesday there, in the interest of Washington Cathedral

Bishop Freeman's name is one of those appearing on the Advisory Committee for Human Welfare, organized in connection with the Yale Institute of Human relations, according to an announcement made recently by Dr. James Rowland Angell, President of Yale. Dr. Angell says in this connection:

"The committee, composed of prominent Americans in all walks of life, has been created to aid the university in its attempt to apply effectively the arts and sciences to the problems of human life. Its membership includes scientists, educators, lawyers, philosophers, engineers and representatives of the different industrial classes and fields. Many of the activities of the institute are already under way and the committee will begin to function as soon as possible.

Rt. Rev. Walter Mitchell, D. D., Bishop.

Southern Arizona Regional Meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary.

The meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary, Southern Region of the Missionary District of Arizona, was held in Bisbee, November 13 and 14. Delegates were present from Tucson, Douglas, Tombstone and Bisbee. The meetings were presided over by Mrs. Arthur, of Douglas, Vice-President for the Southern Region. Dr. Larkin W. Glazebrook, representing the National Commission on Evangelism, spoke to the women in the afternoon of the thirteenth, and to the men that night. Both groups were deeply impressed with Dr. Glazebrook's forceful and earnest appeal. His is a message our Church needs.

On Thursday the day began with a celebration of the Holy Communion in St. John's Church, after which the conference organized for work. Mrs. Todt, of Kingman, State President, spoke of the general work of the Auxiliary. Miss Dorman, of Tucson, spoke on the Gift of Life. Mrs. Wood, of Douglas, on the United Thank Offering. Mrs. Cox, of Bisbee, on the Corporate Gift, and Mrs. Tuthill, of Tucson, on St.-Luke's-in-the-Desert.

After lunch, in the Y. W. C. A., Mrs. Brown, of Flagstaff, Educational Secretary, spoke on our study book for the year, and the meeting closed with an address by Mrs. Spencer, of Naco, on what it meant to be a U. T. C. missionary in China. All left feeling and saying that it had been an interesting and worthwhile meeting.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. H. St. George Tucker, Bishop.

The Bishop's Message.

Our Lord Jesus Christ taught His disciples to pray, "Thy Kingdom come". He then bade them go into all the world and preach the Gospel. God answers our prayer by giving us the opportunity to work with Him for its fulfillment. We still pray, "Thy Kingdom come", and God still points to the world and invites us to join with Him in making that prayer come true. The annual budget of the diocese is an opportunity that God gives us of taking part in the accomplishment of that for which we have prayed. God so loved the world that He gave His own Son that men might be saved. Christ carried out that loving purpose at the cost of His own life. Shall we not welcome the privilege of adding our little sacrifice to His that we may share with Him the joy of bringing nearer to its fulfillment the prayer that He taught us, "Thy Kingdom come?"

COLLECT FOR THE FIRST SUNDAY IN ADVENT.

Almighty God, give us grace that we may cast away the works of darkness, and put upon us the armor of light, now in the time of this mortal visit, in which Thy Son Jesus Christ came to visit us in great humility that in the last day, when He shall come again in His glorious Majesty to judge both the quick and the dead, we may arise to the life immortal, through Him who liveth and reigneth with Thee and the Holy Ghost, now and forever. Amen.

COLLECT FOR ST. ANDREW'S DAY.

Almighty God, who didst give such grace unto Thy holy apostle St. Andrew, that he readily obeyed the calling of Thy Son Jesus Christ and followed Him without delay; grant unto us all that we, being called by Thy Holy Word, may forthwith give up ourselves obediently to fulfil Thy Holy commandments; through the same Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE COMING.

"He comes! in meek and lowly human form,
Unheralded by dazzling pomp and noise,
Not in the fire, the earthquake, or the storm,
But with the accents of 'the still small voice'.

"He comes! to preach the gospel to the poor,
Franchise the slave and break the bondsman's chain,
To wrench the bars from off the dungeon door,
And set the pining captive free again.

"He comes! the messenger to broken hearts;
Affliction of its poignant sting disarms;
To him that hath no helper help imparts;
The little child smiles fearless in His arms.

"He comes! to give the groping blind heir sight,
To wipe the tear from off the mourner's eye,
To cheer the orphan's darkened home with light,
And soothe the widow in her agony.

"He comes! to rescue from the guilt of sin,
And from its tyrant power to grant release;
To hush the rage of demon storms within.
And leave His own best legacy of 'peace'.

"He comes! to stop the roll of conquering drums,
Unyoke the steeds from battle's iron car,
To strike the fevered lips of cannon dumb,
And hang in silent halls the trump of war.
"He comes, O earth, give welcome to His voice!
He comes! Thy tribes to pay Him homage rise!
He comes! to make thine arid wastes rejoice,
And blossom like a second Paradise."

WHY DO MEN NOT GO TO CHURCH?

In his latest book publihsed but a few months before his death, "The Warrior, the Woman and the Christ", Studdert Kennedy relates that one day as as he was conducting a soldiers' service behind the lines, a perky little private asked him if he was going back to take mothers' meetings after the war. Amidst a roar of approving laughter Mr. Kennedy replied, "Look here, young fellow, my lad, you seem to think that you are more important than your mother. You come off it. I'd rather talk to your mother than to you any day of the week, Sunday included."

But the remark set Studdert Kennedy thinking. Why does the warrior always associate the woman and the parson? Why does the Christian religion appeal, as it has always appealed, more powerfully to women than to men? Why don't men go to church in the numbers in which women go? Searching for an answer to these difficult questions, Studdert Kennedy came to the conclusion that the church too often presents Christianity almost exclusively in terms to which the feminine nature naturally responds, ignoring the aggressive and courageous qualities of Christ's extraordinarily manly character. For Christ combines in Himself the ideals before which the man of strength and energy as well as the woman of constructive patience stands in awe and admiration. Christ is the ideal warrior of infinite energy, intellect, skill. But He is not a destructive warrior. All these warrior qualities were consecrated by Him to the creative purpose of establishing the Kingdom of God. In Him both man and woman find the fulfilment of their aspirations.

When we have pondered over Studdert Kennedy's thesis, and have reached a conclusion as to the reasonableness or otherwise of his argument, we shall be prepared to consider other reasons advanced by thoughtful men for their indifference towards the Church. They do not find God there, they say. The church services are, to them, barren of spiritual reality. They are unable to discover in the church service the spiritual power and energy which flow from a conscious relation to God, and which, if possessed by those officiating, ought to flood the service with the light of God's presence even as the face of Moses shone after he had conversed with God. Going to church, these men declare, is too often spiritually unrewarding and mentally fatiguing. So Thomas Hardy felt, after attending a service at a cathedral and finding there no sense of God's nearness or reality, his sad soul poured out its loneliness in poignant verses ending with the lines:

"O doth a bird deprived of wings Go earth-bound wilfully?"

Although Thomas Hardy did not blame the Church for her failure to convince him of spiritual power, although he thought that the fault might be some hindrance in himself, it would be well for the Church to consider if this failure is not sometimes caused by the lack of reality and joyous reverence with which the services are taken.

Other men say that they don't go to church because their slender powers of concentration are unequal to the length of the service and the dullness of the average sermon. Undoubtedly many parsons have no talent for preparing sermons and no happiness in preaching. Their gifts are in other directions; in pastoral work in visiting the sick, in converting individual sinners. The custom—for it is no more than a custom—of tagging on a sermon to every service is as wearisome to them as to the man in the pew. Because there are notable preachers with powers of eloquence admirably suited for instructing and stirring large audiences, must every parson preach? When the parson in love with his pastoral work, but with no mind for study or voice for preaching, is engaged all day in exercising the various functions of his ministry must he, even when his preparation has been woefully insufficient, "exhort the brethren on Sunday"? Perhaps in this day of specialization the suggestion of Miss Sheila Kaye-Smith is worthy of unprejudiced consideration. "As a step towards recovering for the sermon the driving power and inspiration it has largely lost, I would venture to suggest," she writes in the interesting volume of essays, "If I Could Preach Just Once", "that the sermon be no longer served as a common dish, but be set apart for special occasions."

Other men admit frankly that the complexity of modern civilization does not leave time for the accomplishment of everything they would like to do and therefore the things of lesser interest are crowded out. There are so many things to do in our modern day that it is impossible to do them all and church attendance suffers because of the multiplicity of activities inviting men to seek entertainment and pleasure.

One of the finest of our young men, brought up as a boy to attend worship at least once every Sunday, writes to the Canadian Churchman on this subject as follows: "The intelligent man of today must be conversant with a great many more topics than he was fifty years ago. He must know his business, some sports, belong to clubs, play bridge, know some books, music, shows, geography, history, politics, stocks, automobiles, science and one hundred and one other things. To be a congenial companion of the average man of the world one's information must embrace most of these items. I am not claiming that any one of these is as important to a man as religion, but these are the things in which the crowd is interested and most people just follow the crowd. There are not enough hours in the week for the average man to accomplish the things he would like to do, and so Sunday becomes an extra week-day." After giving a formidable list of his engagements for the next week this young man concludes: "I make no defense of my neglect of church. Invitations and events just pop up until my program is filled for another week. That's a week's schedule, and the week is an average week and I am an average man."

If we are going to compare the Church with our social activities, deciding their relative values by their power to entertain and amuse, it is inevitable that the theatre, the golf links, the bridge club and the tennis court will be given first place. The problem here is to convince men who have allowed themselves to drift into habits of judging everything by the interest they feel in them, that worship is the most interesting and the most profitable activity in which they can engage.

Not distinguishing between religion, i. e., the relation of the soul to God, and theology, i. e., the attempt to give a coherent account of religion, some men stay away from church because they do not believe what they think the Church teaches. Other men honestly facing the difficulty—they would say impossibility—of following the Christian ethical standards in their business, do not attend church on Sunday because they do not intend to organize their business on Christian principles. In these circumstances to go to church appears to them to be inexcusable hypocrisy. Yet other Christian business men are giving profound attention to the problems of industry and declare that readjustments aiming at bringing industry into harmony with the teaching of Jesus are slowly being made.

Perhaps, too, men absent themselves from church because the present in breaking with the past has not yet found new ideals to take the place of the ideals they have thrown aside. Sir Phillips Gibbs has recently said that only by the faith responsible for the ideals of the past, "reawakened, strengthened by science, reaching out across the world, controlling the machines and instruments of power, working for peace and raising the standard of charity, in the spirit of Christ, may we go forward to meet the unknown future, unafraid". When, in the forward march of time, such faith is once more in the ascendency and new ideals are firmly in possession of our minds, men will no longer present, to the same extent as today, the puzzling problem of their indifference to the Church.—Canadian Churchman.

Effective Preparation and Presentation of the Sunday-School Lesson.

The Rev. Alan Pressley Wilson.

In Two Parts. Part II.

One of the many passages of Scripture that appeal to me very strongly is "the effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much". For a long time I thought of this passage in the way I suppose many others view it; i. e., "that the fervent prayers of the righteous would be effective in producing good results". In other words, that fervent prayers produced an effort upon God, the Hearer and Answerer of prayers, and that He was entirely responsible for the effectual nature of whatever is accomplished. And, while I do not desire even to intimate that in my opinion God's arm is "shortened", I do want to realize that much depends upon me, upon you, upon us all.

Let us look at this passage a moment. James says that it is the "effectual prayer, fervently made", that avails. To be of value, then; to serve God and our fellow man, our prayers must be effectual, and "effectual" prayers are more than effective prayers. There is a difference in the shade of meaning in favor of the former. The word effectual carries with it all that effective means, together with the idea that the power to produce is inherent in the one who is causing the effect. God does not do for us that which we can do for ourselves. He has made us free agents: has given us the power to think and do; to decide and to put into action. He therefore has implanted in the heart and mind the power to pray effectual prayers—prayers that produce effect as a result of the power given to us to use for His glory.

"But what," I know you are thinking, "can this have to do with my topic, "Effective Preparation and Presentation of the Sunday-School Lesson"? Just this: back of the presentation of the lesson is the preparation, while back of the preparation is that power of God; divine power, divinely-given to human beings; to prepare in such a way that both the preparation and the presentation will be effectual. That, after all, is the work of the teacher. That is the sum and substance of what we learn from the study of the life and work of the Great Teacher, the Master Teacher, Jesus Christ.

Next to our Lord the Apostle Paul was the greatest teacher, the most erudite, the best logician the world ever has known. Speaking of the performance of a good deed, he said that there must be "first a willing mind", and that is a prerequisite for a teacher.

Let me digress a moment to ask whether those who read this are teachers because they have been saved to serve Jesus Christ, or whether you teach because you cannot get out of it? You want to please the superintendent; you want to stand well in the community; you want the distinction that you think a teacher has; you have some other ulterior motive. You are like the young man of whom the following conversation was had: Meeting the young man's father, a mutual friend asked what the young fellow expected to do, since the war was over and high wages in industry was a thing of the past. "I do not know," replied the father with sadness. "I guess he'll have to go back to teaching!" To think of a sacred profession, such as is teaching, dragged into the dust and entered into lightly, forsooth because it offered the only opportunity for making a living! Shame on any one who views the life of a teacher in one of our schools in the light of a mercenary work. And if teaching in the public schools is a sacred work, how much more the teaching of the heart and soul of a never-dying child of God? The public school teacher receives compensation, and this is right: the Sunday-school teacher receives compensation likewise, but not in visible currency. It comes in the consciousness of worthwhile work well done; in the blessed hope of being able to merit the words of Jesus when He shall come to claim His own, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant: thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things: enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

"Woe is unto me if I preach not the gospel!" This was the ever-impelling motive behind everything the great apostle did. He recognized that he had been "saved to serve", that there was resting upon him a sacred obligation to break the bread of life to those who were dying of hunger. Just so, the faithful teachers in our schools ever will feel a weight pressing down upon them and be constrained to say, "Woe is unto me if I teach not the gospel!

So, then, the "willing mind" is a very necessary adjunct to all of your teaching. I value most highly the willingness to a teacher to teach. A willing but ignorant teacher can be used of God in the salvation of precious souls, but an unwilling teacher, be he ever so well educated, does nothing but instill culture into the minds of the pupils, and it was kultur that was at the bottom of one of the most awful, most diabolical, most life-taking wars the world ever has known or will know. (For God grant that what we know as the World War may be, as we were made to believe, the "war to end war"!)

Do not misunderstand me. I believe it to be the duty of every teacher to be informed and to know the best methods of teaching and reaching the hearts of pupils committed to his care. There should be a Teacher Training class in every school or group of schools conveniently located. The ideal is for every teacher to be a graduate of a Teacher Training class, but it is not always possible to accomplish this. If not, then I say, "Give me a consecrated though ignorant teacher, rather than the most learned whose heart is not in the greatest work committed to mankind".

Just A Little Boy.

Listen, son; I am saying this to you as you lie asleep; one little paw crumpeled under your cheek and the blonde curls stickily wet on your damp forhead. I have stolen into your room alone. Just a few moment ago, as I sat reading my paper in the library, a hot stiffling wave of remorse swept over me. I could not resist it. Guiltily I came to your bedside.

These are things I was thinking, son: I had been cross to you. I scolded you as you were dressing for school because you gave your face merely a dab with a towel. I took you to task for not cleaning your shoes. I called out angrily when I found you haw thrown some of your things on the floor.

At breakfast I found fault too. You spilled things. You gulped down your food. You put your elbows on the table. You spread butter too thick on your bread. And as you started oft to play and I made for my train, you turned and waved a little hand and called, "Good-bye, Daddy," and I frowned, and said in reply, "Hold your shoulders back."

Then it began all over again the late afternoon. As I came up the hillroad, I spied you, down on your knees playtng marbles. There were holes in your stockings. I humiliated you before your by making you march ahead of me back to the house.

Do you remember, later, when I was reading in the library how you came in, soft, with a sort of hurt look in your eyes? When I glanced up over my paper, you hesitated at the door. "What is it that you want?" I snapped.

You said nothing, but you ran across, and in one tempestuous plunge threw your arms around my neck and kissed me, and your little arms tightened with an affection that God set blooming in your heart and even neglect could not wither. And then you were gone, pattering up the stairs.

Well, soon, it was shortly afterwards that a terrible fear came over me. What had habit been doing to me ?

There was so much that was good, and fine, and true in your character. You did not deserve my treatment of you son. The little heart of you was as big as the dawn itself over the wide hills. All this was shown by your spontaneous impulse to rush in and kiss me goodnight.

I know you would not understand these things if I told them to you during your waking hours. Tomorrow I will be a real daddy. I will keep saying as if it were ritual: "He is nothing but a little boy." Yesterday you were in your mother's arms, your head on her shoulder. I asked too much.

Dear little son. A penitent kneels at your infant shrine, here in the moonlight. I kiss the little fingers, and the damp forehead, and the yellow curls; and, if it were not for waking you, I would snatch you up and hold you to my breast.

Tears came, and heartache, and remorse, and — I — think a greater, deeper love, when you ran through the library door and wanted to kiss me.—Author Unknown.—

PATHS.

John S. Stephens.

How often have I heard folk say,
"I wonder where it ends"?
Some little path that runs away
And turns and twists and bends.

And ever as I hear it said
Another path appears
Before mine eyes, and I am led
Far back across the years.

To where I said, the same as they,
"I wonder where it ends"?
This path of Life that runs away
And turns and twists and bends.

It cannot be this well-worn trail
Pressed by so many feet,
Is leading on to no avail,
To barrenness complete?

Ah, no, the grave is but a turn
Along Life's winding lane,
And past this corner we shall learn
The path leads on again.

The Dog and the Lizard.

Halsa Allison Kyser.

Ziamah is a little black boy who lives in far-away Liberia. He goes to the mission school and loves his teacher, Miss Robinson, very much. She tells him stories, not only of the Christ Child, but also of American boys and girls. In return, he tells her folk tales of his own land.

One cold night, when Miss Robinson had been in Africa for only a few months, she thought she heard a child crying, far off in the forest. She was getting ready to go out into the chill darkness in search of the child, when Ziamah stopped her. There was no human voice, he insisted, and this is the legend he told, in proof:

Many centuries ago a big Lizard and a Dog lived together in the forest. They loved each other, and in the summer were very happy. But when winter came, trouble came too. The Dog had long hair to keep himself warm, but the poor Lizard had no hair, and when the rain fell and the wind blew he shivered with cold. They had heard about fire to warm by, so the Dog told the Lizard to lie down and cover himself with leaves while he went away to try and find the fire. The Dog traveled many days, until he came to a town where Man lived, and there he found fire. Man fed the Dog and was kind to him; the Dog was comfortable and happy and soon forgot the poor Lizard. But the Lizard did not forget the Dog, and you can still hear him crying in the woods when the nights are cold.

STAND BY YOUR COLORS.

A True Story—Almost.

Little Sam Baker was eight years old He lived with his mother and sisters in a small town in Central Missouri during the time of the great Civil War. Sam was a Confederate. His father was a soldier in the great Confederate Army, but his mother's brother Charles, Sam's favorite uncle, was a soldier in the Union Army. So Sam Baker couldn't hate the Union soldiers.

The little town in which Sam lived was in disputed territory. The South said its people were loyal to them. The North said its people were loyal to them. But Sam Baker knew that some of the people were loyal to the South and some of the people were loyal to the North. Neighbors and families were divided—even brothers, maybe.

Sam's grandfather lived three miles out in the country along the big, dusty highway, or "turnpike", the Southern people used to call the road. Usually, in nice weather, on Saturday mornings when his grandfather brought his butter and eggs and other farm produce in to town to sell, Sam Baker would ride out to the country with his grandfather to eat dinner with his grandmother. He would then walk home in the late afternoon. He always took with him his big collie dog Pat. Sam's mother knew that Pat was the best of companions for Sam.

One Saturday morning in late May—May is the most beautiful month of all in Missouri—Sam and Pat rode out into the country with Sam's grandfather. The Confederate soldiers were billeted in the town, so all seemed well. His mother thought it would be safe for Sam to go. He spent a happy day with his grandparents, and romped and played with Pat along the road on the way home.

By the time Sam neared the town he was rather tired, so he walked more slowly, but he was happy and was whistling a tune. He walked with his head down watching the dust of the road spatter up over his little bare feet—even up between his toes if he spread them open!

Suddenly Pat halted and barked sharply, then growled. Sam looked up quickly. There a few feet before him in the center of the road stood a Union soldier—a picket on guard duty—with pointing bayonet. When Sam looked up the soldier called, Halt"!

Sam obeyed.

"Call back your dog." Sam spoke to Pat and held him by the collar.

"Who are you?" asked the picket.

"Sam Baker."

"Where are you going?"

"Home," said Sam.

"Where have you been?"

"Spending the day at my grandfather's."

"Are you Union or rebel?"

Sam looked at the soldier's blue uniform. He knew what answer would let him pass. In the distance he could see smoke curling up from his mother's kitchen chimney. He wanted to go home. He knew how anxious his mother would be if he didn't come pretty soon. Of course he didn't know what would happen exactly if he answered, truthfully, "Confederate, sir". But he feared he would not be allowed to pass, for he could guess what had happened in the town while he was away. The Confederate soldiers had retreated to take up a more favorable position, or to save the town. The Union soldiers had advanced and now occupied the town. So Sam Baker took the easier way and answered:

"Union, sir."

"Pass on!" said the picket, as Sam knew he would.

Sam walked past, still holding to Pat's collar, for Pat's hair was bristling and he was growling. Then Sam began to run, happy in his escape. He was almost home when he stopped. What would his father say if he knew Sam had denied his colors? He blushed with shame. A soldier's son to deny his colors! And what would his mother say if she knew Sam had spoken an untruth! Sam stood still a while and thought.

What should he do now? If he went back now to the picket and said he was "Confederate", no doubt he would be shot for a spy! And Pat, who was innocent, might be shot!

"Go home, Pat, go home!" he commanded. The reluctant dog trotted away, looking back at his little master as if to say, "Aren't you coming"?

Sam waited until the dog was almost home. He thought, "My mother will know when she sees Pat that I have been captured by the Union Army, but she will know, too, that I told them the truth!"

Sam took courage in that and ran back to the picket.

"Please, sir," said Sam, "I'm Confederate."

The picket looked down at the little boy, nervously turning his cap in his hand, his head bowed, his toes curling, one foot over the other.

Gently the Union soldier put his hand on Sam's head, turned his face up that he might look into his eyes. Sam faced the soldier bravely. Of course the picket had to tell him that he must be shot!—Ann Fairchild in Sunday-School Times.

Our Gardens.

A youth was landed upon a strange island and left there to find his own way and to get his living as best he could. As he strode inland he thought he should easily get his living; for he had a purse of money and a handful of precious stones, and he saw that the island was well inhabited and that every house had a garden of some kind or other. He noted that some of the gardens contained breadfruit and maize and many sorts of orchard trees, while others seemed to have nothing but earth-nuts and dandelions and nettles. But as he began to be hungry he did not puzzle long over the odd, weedy gardens, but went up to a house which stood in the middle of a rich, beautifully kept bit of ground, knocked at the door, and said: "Will you sell me some of your breadfruit and a few grapes? I am hungry."

The man who opened the door shook his head and answered:

"I don't wish to cheat you, young man, so I won't sell you any kind of fruit. I will give you a slip of the vine, or one of the breadfruit trees, and welcome."

"That is absurd!" replied the youth. "I cannot eat vine leaves." However, the man stuck to his refusal. He would sell no fruit; so the boy went on to another cottage, but received the same answer. After trying several houses in vain, he came to one where the master of the house was not so churlish.

"Breadfruit and grapes, young master?" he said. "Yes, you may have as much as you want for one of those bits of silver, and a melon and some oranges besides."

The boy was glad and went away (for the man did not ask him to sit down), loaded with his delicious food. He sat down under a spreading tree on nice soft turf and began to make a meal. He ate all that the man had sold to him, but strange to say, he felt just as hungry as before!

"It is queer," he said to himself; "the air of this island gives one a tremendous appetite, but I must have more food." So he went back to the civil man, and inquired whether he had any maize, or, better still, a loaf of wheaten bread.

"To be sure I have!" replied the man, and brought out a big loaf and a bag full of maize. Again the youth sat down and ate, but, though he began to feel as though he had had too much to eat, as he was just as hungry as ever, and not only hungry, but very thirsty. Once more he went back to the cottage where he had bought the fruit and food and asked for a draught of water. The cottager brought him a huge pitcher full of water, and the thirsty lad drank eagerly and long, and again and again; but somehow he was just as thirsty in a minute or so as he had been at first. He began to think that the island was enchanted, and that he was doomed to die of hunger in the midst of plenty. While he was in distress of mind, a man came along the road who seemed to be a person in authority; so the youth went up to him and told him his case.

"Just so," said the stranger. "What you need is a garden of your own. The fruit of this island nourishes only those who grow it; but you need not be alarmed. The law ordains that everyone in the island, or who is left here, shall have a patch of gardens given to him."

So saying, he bade the youth follow him, and in a while they came to some pieces of ground which were fenced off, but on which no houses were built.

"You may take this patch," said the stranger, "as your own, and you may grow what you choose."

"But," said the lad, who was terribly hungry, "how shall I live until I have grown food for myself?"

The stranger smiled and answered, "Things grow very quickly in this island but you will not have to starve, even as long as you will have to wait. I will give you an apple and a small pumpkin. If you save the seeds for your garden, these things will go a long way toward satisfying your hunger for the present, and the pumpkin seed will grow furiously."

The youth thanked the kind stranger and went with him to his house. As the man said, he found that, when he had carefully taken out the seeds of the fruit, and put them by, the fruit did him much good. Then he asked for water.

"Go into the garden," said the host, "and pull up the bucket from the bottom of the well."

The lad obeyed, and, though it was hard work to get the bucket to the top, he was delighted to find that the water quenched his thirst. Early the next morning he began work in his own garden, and—not to make a long story—I may tell you that he soon had a rich and fruitful garden, and lived right well. In a short time he learned the secret of the miserable gardens. They were the property of people who did not take the trouble to buy good seed, but were content to cultivate, in a sort of way, whatever the wind blew into their gardens. The flourishing gardens belonged to people who were always on the lookout for useful seeds and cuttings and tubers, and took great pains.

You live in just such an island. Your mind is your garden plot, and the lessons you learn at school, and the good books you read, are the fruits which have been grown in other people's gardens. They will not really satisfy the hunger of your mind, or make you strong, unless you save the seeds—that is, unless you think about things for youself. And whatever you save and grow for yourself in your own garden will really feed and enrich your mind. And so it happens that there are people who read many books, and are none the wiser, and people who read very few, but are full of good sense.

But worst of all are the people who let any sort of weeds grow in their minds, who never choose their reading, or take pains to think for themselves, and so have to feed their hunger with docks and nettles and pignuts.

But only those thoughts will really nourish you which you have thought for yourselves.—Junior Church Manual.

For The Southern Churchman.

A MORNING PRAYER.

Maude Forrest Mumma.

Dear Lord, I lift my eyes to pray,
And ask Thy blessing on the day;
Ask Thee to guide my feet aright,
And keep me safely until night.

I pray Thee for my loved ones, too,
Hearts that love Thee, loyal, true;
Help them to know, though scattered far
How kind, how good, Thy percepts are.

I pray Thee for the stranger here,
Though far removed from loved ones dear;
Help him to feel Thy guiding hand,
Though traveling in a distant land.

These mercies I of Thee implore,
Keep Thou the well, the sick restore;
Until the day of life be past,
And we are safely moored at last.

Finding a Friend.

Jeannette sighed. Life had not been easy for her since her mother's death. Years before, her father, the doctor back in Grossilier, had fallen in love with and married the little French nurse in the hospital there. Her death when the twins were thirteen came as a great shock to him. He decided to try his luck in distant Canada. Thus it was that he had arrived in the trading post at Fort Churchill with Pierre and Jeannette. It was difficult to build up a practice in 1880, for the Indians did not trust the white men very much.

"If I only had some chum to play with I would be happy," Jeannette sighed again.

Suddenly the laughing Pierre called her to come out, so she scrambled into outdoor clothes in great haste.

As she emerged from the door a snowball struck her, and for two minutes the two playfully snowballed each other.

"Do you really think you'll need your little first-aid kit?" asked Pierre laughingly.

"I like to take it with me because it reminds me of my friends who gave it to me as a parting gift from Grossillier. Let's go for a walk, Pierre. I can walk about two miles each way."

As the children passed a number of surly looks were cast their way and it was with great relief that they passed safely out of the village.

"I'll beat you to that hill, Jeannette," challenged Pierre.

"Will, eh!" taunted his sister as she flew away ahead of him. But she could not keep up this pace all the way and the two reached the top together.

As they stood, panting, on the brow of the hill they saw an Indian woman approaching. For a moment Jeannette was frightened, but her fears were calmed as she saw the evident terror in the woman's face.

"Girl sick," she gasped. "She die. Medicine man. Quick!"

In a few words the twins decided what to do. While Pierre returned to the village for their father, Jeannette would go on to see if she could help the distressed squaw.

When they arrived at the hut, Jeannette hurried in. On a bed in a corner of the room lay a girl of her own age, crying out in her delirium. Jeannette remembered the times she had accompanied her father on just such occasions. How thankful she was that she had brought her aid kit!

Water," she ordered.

She put some in a kettle on the open fire and some in a pan by the bed. Taking some bandages from her pocket kit, Jeannette soaked them in water and applied them to the girl's forehead.

In half an hour Dr. Belcourt arrived. After about two hours child fell asleep. As the doctor arose the door was flung open and in rushed the chief with his tribe.

The squaw explained briefly how the doctor had saved the child's life. For a moment the chief, who was the father of the girl, conversed with the rest of his tribe, while Dr. Belcourt stood calmly beside the bedside.

Then the chief took his pipe from his mouth and handed it to the twins' father. He took it and puffed silently on it for a moment.

Since then he has had constant practice and the Indians pay him well with their furs, but happiest of all are Jeannette and Pierre in their new friend, who takes as great a part in their affections as did any of the other children back in Grossillier.—Girls' World.

The Label.

On a bright June morning Arthur Hill and Ralph Fosdick met at the door of the big Fletcher building, and, hurrying together down the corridor, entered the elevator already occupied by a bevy of girls going to their work in various offices on the floors.

Arthur, glancing around, quickly removed his hat, and as the car shot upward held it in his hand, but Ralph kept his cap on his head and stood staring straight before him, his hands in his pockets.

Both young men were employed as clerks in the office of the well-known law firm of Bacon and Bolton, and as they left the elevator Ralph turned to his companion with a grin.

"Say," he remarked, "think it pays to be as mighty polite as all that?"

Arthur gave him a keen look.

"As all what?" he questioned.

"Why, taking off your hat in the elevator," Ralph explained, "just because a lot of girls happened to be on board."

"But I always do it," Arthur asserted, "and I thought you did, too."

"Used to," Ralph acknowledged. "Mother always fretted if I didn't. But I've noticed that very few fellows are so fussy, and decided not to bother any more. Of course, if you're with people you know it's different, but strangers don't often matter. For instance, I bet those giggling, gum-chewing 'stenogs' didn't care whether my cap was on or off."

"Maybe some of the didn't," Arthur conceded, "but don't count on bad manners getting by with many girls. And besides, that's not the point. It's my idea that care about such things is what marks a chap as a real gentleman, a sort of lagel, you know."

"I don't agree with you," Ralph said a bit sharply. "I consider myself a gentleman, and I think on the whole my manners are pretty fair, but if I want to let down a trifle now and then I feel I have a right to do it."

"Certainly you have a right," Arthur owned, "but watch out, old man. Personally, I shouldn't dare 'let down', as you call it. It's easy to form bad habits, and if you're careless one place you're apt to be in another, and maybe here you least want to be caught napping. I think it's safer to keep your label clear all the time."

"All right," Ralph replied tartly, as they reached the door of their office, "go ahead and take off your hat in public elevators, and give up your seat in the street cars, and all the rest of it, but I think you're mighty foolish, Art."

Several hours later, when Ralph was putting away his work before the lunch hour, Mr. Bacon, the head of the firm, paused by his desk.

"What are you planning to do over the week-end, Fosdick?" he asked.

"Nothing particular, sir," Ralph replied.

Then come down to 'Oceanside', my summer place, and spend Sunday," Mr. Bacon invited. "I'm asking young Hill, too, and my girls will give you both a good time."

Ralph was a stranger in the city, and after attending church on Sundays, returned to his dingy hall bed room to divide the remainder of the day between the newspapers and homesick thoughts of the cottage in a distant village where his mother lived with his two young sisters. The prospect of escaping one lonely week-end delighted him.

"Oh, thank you, Mr. Bacon!" he exclaimed. "I'd like to come awfully well."

"That's fine," and his employer smiled kindly at his eagerness. "I'll drive you and Hill down in my car after we close the office on Saturday."

It was a very pleasant road over which the big Bacon car bowled smoothly on the following Saturday afternoon. For some distance it ran through whispering pine woods, then came out in the open country with sunny fields, pink and sweet with wild roses on one hand, and on the other the blue sea, stretching away to the coast to Spain. Oceanside, the Bacon home, was a handsome mansion, set on a hill with lawns and gardens sloping down to the water, and on the shady veranda the lawyer's pleasant-faced wife and his two pretty daughters, Ann and Penelope, were awaiting their guests.

Mr. Bacon presented the young men and turned to give an order to his chauffeur. The ladies shook hands cordially then seated themselves, and Ralph was about to follow their example when he suddenly realized that he had forgotten to remove his cap. Flushing hotly, he snatched it off, but he knew the two girls had noticed and were looking at him curiously.

"How could I have been such an idiot?" he moaned inwardly.

And the hour on the veranda before it was time to get ready for dinner was spoiled for him.

Following his employer into the big, cool dining room he began to feel at ease again, but as he dropped into his seat it dawned upon him that both his host and Arthur were still standing. Mr. Bacon had pulled out Ann's chair for her before going to his own, and Arthur had performed the same service for his hostess. Penelope had slipped into her seat unattended, and was now gazing at him with unmistakable disapproval.

After that the delicious dinner was as dust and ashes to Ralph. Meals in the little cottage had always been nicely served. His mother had been particularly about that, and she had also seen that her children's table manners were good. Therefore the young man would ordinarily have been neither disturbed nor overawed by his first experience at the dinner table of a rich man, but would have enjoyed the good things with true bovish appetite. As it was, he was miserable, and was thankful when the little party adjourned to the library and Mr. Bacon turned on the radio.

When at last he and Arthur ascended their great airy room with its twin four-posters and tiled bath, he broke out into bitter lamentations.

"I don't see," he bewailed, "how I ever came to make such awful breaks. Of course, I knew better. What do you suppose ailed me, Art?"

Arthur laid a soothing hand on his friend's arm.

"Can't you see, old chap?" he queried. "It's that you haven't been keeping yourself up to standard. You've 'let down' and fallen into bad habits."

"I suppose you mean about taking off my hat, and giving up my seat, and all that," Ralph said.

"That's it," Arthur answered.

"Well, I've queered myself with the Bacons all right," Ralph mourned.

"Oh, no!" Arthur disputed. "The girls looked a little odd, but they're nice, sensible kids, and won't lay anything up against you, and I know Mrs. Bacon understood. She's that sort. And as for the boss, he knows that though you may not be a social lion you're a mighty good clerk.

"It'll never be quite the same," Ralph insisted sadly, "but, believe me, I don't mean to get caught this way again. From now on I'm going to look out for my manners wherever I am and whoever I'm with. I'm going to see that my label is plain and clear for all to read at all times."—Kind Words.

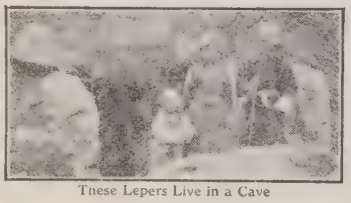
A Lesson From Nature.

A bird's feathers not only keep it warm, but help it to fly. Being broad they act like paddles in the air, and are so light they do not weigh it down. Besides having feathers to help its flight, the bird has little sac-like balloons inside its body which are filled with air from its lungs and from which the air passes into the bones and other parts of the body. Every time the bird breathes these sacs and lungs and bones are filled with fresh air. This is the reason that birds are lighter than other animals and can sail in the air for such long distances.



Birds sing so sweetly because their voice box is made differently from that of other animals. Instead of being placed near the throat as ours is, it is in the bird's breast, where the windpipe forks to go into the lungs. The walls of the bird's voice-box are thin, and instead of having cords stretched across it, there is a thin valve which works like the reed in a organ pipe.—Selected.

Courage Wins Happiness in Tough Battle

YOU would think a very old lady laid up with a broken thigh in a plaster cast would be a hard person to keep happy. Yet, according to Nurse Helen V. Griffin, 64 Prospect Avenue, Hackensack, New Jersey, it can be done—if you know how.

"My patient," says Miss Griffin, "being unable to move about by herself became very constipated. Many medicines in pill form were used with little or no results. Finally when we came home from the hospital I began the use of Nujol.

"Soon my patient became regular and comfortable, without any pain or discomfort. Now she is happy and cheerful, since regularity has begun and continued with such little trouble."

If Nujol will make an old lady feel well, who cannot move around in her bed, what will it do for you?

Nurse Griffin knew how harmless Nujol is, containing no drugs or medicine, but acting only as a natural lubricant. She knew how it keeps excess of body poisons from forming (we all have them) and helps carry them away.

Women need a natural aid like Nujol just as much, if not more than men. There are so many physical conditions they have to go through that upset their normal schedule.

Always Smiling!

Just remember that all your body needs to be regular as clock-work is a simple natural lubricant. Be sure, however, that you get the right one—the one tested and approved by millions of people.

See what Nujol will do for you. You can get it at any drug store for the price of a ticket to a good movie. You will find that Nujol works easily, normally. Try it today!

You'll wonder how you ever lived without this natural, pleasant, easy way to health and happiness!

Deaths

MARY WELLS BISHOP.

MARY WELLS BISHOP, faithful communicant and friend of God, was promoted to an even more intimate friendship with her Father in Heaven on Friday, October 25th. One of the early members of the Church of the Redeemer, Sayre, Pennsylvania, her loyalty and ability strengthened the parish throughout its fifty years of growth. Organist, when needed, Woman's Auxiliary president as often as she would accept the office, friend of strangers, she used her exceptional ability in living her daily prayer, 'Thy Kingdom come". May the peace of God abide with all her loved ones forever.

G. B. W.

MRS. JAMES N. DUNLOP.

"After this I looked and behold a door was opened in Heaven and the first voice which I heard was as it were of a trumpet talking with me which said, 'Come up higher'." John 4:1.

On the night of October 27 "God touched her and she slept". I do not try to speak of the wonderful intellect, or her genius for motherhood, or the beautiful relationship that was hers as daughter, sister and wife, for when I think on the life of BESSIE DUNLOP one word seems to overshadow all others to me and that is Friend. I do not remember the time when I did not know her, and in all these years her loyal devotion to my family is one of the beautiful things I like to think on, an enrichment it was to all who were fortunate enough to win her friendship, for once given it was never recalled. There was a man once who, when asked for the inspiration of his life, simply said, "I had a friend"! Such an answer might be made by many who won the friendship of dear Bessie Dunlop. Loyal love, fearless truth and trust in God shone in her face and breathed in her actions, so that those who knew her were bound to be the better for it in life, and now in remembrace. We who love her feel very lonely but we feel "this is not the end, rather the fulfillment", of that brave, heroic life she lived amongst us. Dear, "loyal heart and true", we leave you standing here in the light, 'and as we think on you we say as St. Paul of old, "We thank our God on every remembrance of you".

15, is already well under way. $146,800 is the sum of money needed to meet the bare necessities of the work which we are already doing in the Diocese of Virginia, with no provision for advance or extension; $48,000 is our quota for the work of the General Church to be distributed through the National Council.

In the past few years Virginia's progress has attracted the attention of the whole nation. This industrial progress has created new opportunities and new responsibilities for the Church. To meet this situation we should strive for at least $15,000 over and above the budget to be used for Church Extension.

Thus the total amount desired is $209,800.

"Behold I stand at the door and knock."

"Jesus said unto him, If thou wilt be perfect, go and sell that thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven; and come and follow me."

"Every man according as he purposeth in his heart, so let him give; not grudgingly, or of necessity; for God loveth a cheerful giver."

LEXINGTON.

Rt. Rev. H. P. Almon Abbott, D. D., Bishop.

Notable Progress.

Within the past six months, six new clergymen are at work in the Diocese of Lexington. This brings the total up to twenty-four. This is the largest number of clergymen ever listed in the records of the diocese. Of this number, twenty-two are priests, and two are deacons.

The number of lay readers in the past six months has risen from eight to nineteen. This, also, is the record number of lay readers ever engaged in active service in the diocese.

At the present time, there are six postulants, and six candidates for Holy Orders. This, again, exceeds all former records.

Bishop Abbott is to hold an eight-day mission in Christ Church, Lexington, January 5-12, inclusive. Preparation for the Mission is already in progress. The Bishop is, also, to hold a five-day Mission in Trinity Church, Galevston, Texas, beginning Sunday, December 1.

The entire diocese has been covered by personal appeal and through the distribution of graded local literature for the forthcoming Every Member Canvass. The newly-created Field Department, with the Rev. William B. Dern as Executive Secretary, has done yeoman service in this connection.

A splendid conference of the laymen of the diocese, under the call of the Bishop was held in the Phoenix Hotel, Lexington, on Tuesday, November 26. The speakers were Bishop Abbott, the Rev. William B. Dern, Archdeacon Reinheimer of Southern Ohio, and Mr. J. Swannell of Champaign, Illinois.

MARYLAND.

Rt. Rev. E. T. Helfenstein, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. David May.

The Rev. David S. May died in Baltimore on Wednesday, November 13, and was buried on Friday, November 15, in Ivy Hill Cemetery, Alexandria, Va. The funeral service was held in the Church of the Ascension, Baltimore, and was conducted by the Rt. Rev. E. F. Helfenstein, the Rev. Philip J. Jensen and the Rev. Robert E. Browning, rector of the parish.

The Rev. Mr. Jensen conducted the service at the grave.

Mr. May has been retired for several years, but his last parish was St. John's Church, Worthington Valley, Maryland. He is survived by his widow.

Convocation of Cumberland.

The Rev. Charles E. McAllister, rector of the Church of St. Michael and All Angels, Baltimore, was the preacher on Tuesday evening, November 19, at the opening service of the Convocation of Cumberland, in St. John's Church, Hagerstown. The following morning Holy Communion was celebrated by Bishop Helfenstein.

The Rev. Dr. Louis G. Woods made a splendid address on the Every Member Canvass and the Budgets of the Diocese and General Church. The Rev. J. Moulton Thomas, minister-in-charge of St. Thomas' Church, Hancock, read a paper, "The Deacon Looks at the Ministry".

After luncheon in the parish house, the women of the Convocation were addressed by Mrs. A. Murdock Norris, President of the Church Service League in Maryland; Mrs. William H. Laird, Chairman of the Educational Department of the C. S. L. and Mrs. Marcelyn Adams from Pittsburgh.

Woman's Auxiliary in Maryland.

The Woman's Auxiliary in the Diocese of Maryland held a memorial service for the Rt. Rev. John Gardner Murray, D. D., late Presiding Bishop of the Church and Bishop of Maryland, in Old Saint Paul's Church, at 11 o'clock, on Thursday, November 21, 1929.

The Rt. Rev. T. T. Helfenstein celebrated the Holy Communion, assisted by the Rev. Arthur B. Kinsolving, D. D., rector of the Church, and the Rev. Harold N. Arrowsmith, Canon of the Pro-Cathedral, Baltimore.

The sermon was preached by the Rt. Rev. Hugh Burleson, D. D., Assessor to Bishop Murray.

The United Thank Offering of the Women of the Diocese was presented at this service.

In the afternoon, the missionary meeting was held in the parish house of the Pro-Cathedral, at which Bishop Helfenstein presided. The Work of the Mission's Industries Schools in the Appalachian Mountains was presented. Dr. John W. Wood, Executive Secretary of the Department of Missions of the National Council, spoke on some most important phases of the Church work in the mission field.

Dedication of Bronze Cross.

On St. Michael and All Angels' Day a beautiful bronze cross was dedicated at All Saints' Church, Calvert County, to the memory of James Thompson Briscoe, 1828-1903, and Anne Parran Briscoe, his wife, 1826-1864, and their sons, Judge John Parran Briscoe, 1852-1925; Dr. Philip Briscoe, 1855-927; James Thompson Briscoe, 1857-1925, and William Christian Briscoe, 1861-1913.

The Prayers of Dedication and Sermon were read and preached by the Rev. Dr. James M. Magruder of Annapolis, Maryland.

The Cross is of solid bronze, about six feet tall and surmounts a small tower on the west end of the church, with a bronze tablet in the church, near the Holy Table, bearing the inscription

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. C Thomson, D. D., Coadjutor

Annual Meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary.

The thirty-seventh annual meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary of the Diocese of Southern Virginia convened in St. Luke's Church, Norfolk, October 29-31, with a record-breaking attendance of two hundred and fifty delegates and visitors, including guests from the Dioceses of North Carolina and Georgia.

"Japan" and "Our Diocese" were the keynote topics of discussion.

Addresses were delivered by the Rt. Rev. C. S. Reifsnider, Suffragan Bishop of North Tokyo, Japan; Miss Louisa H. Boyd, U. T. O. Missionary to North Tokyo; Miss Grace Lindly, National Executive Secretary; Mrs. T. K. Wade, National Supply Secretary.

Miss Mildred Edmonds, of Dabney House, spoke of the great opportunity for an Industrial School at this center. Miss Annie Hankins reported the Phoebe Ann Community House. Deaconess Howell, the Jackson-Field Home. Plans are being made to erect here an additional cottage, to be known as the Maria Washington Tucker Cottage, a memorial to the wife of our beloved Bishop B. D. Tucker.

The report from "Camp Robert Hunt", a recreational camp for boys and girls, first conceived by Bishop A. C. Thompson, and now in its seventh year, was made by Mrs. E. V. Brush. More applications came than could be cared for. It ran ahead of expenses, paid for many improvements, reduced the debt, so that the entire property is very nearly paid for.

"Chatham Hall Diocesan School" was presented by the rector. Dr. Edmund J. Lee, D. D., the Fork Community House by Mrs. Henry Edmunds, Vice-President and a written report from Mrs. Clark told the story of the Clarkton Community House.

Mrs. Frank Darling, Honorary President and Field Secretary of this Diocese in an address, said:

"There are about twelve thousand women communicants in Southern Virginia. We have about two thousand and five hundred listed as members of Woman's Auxiliary. Where are the other nine thousand and five hundred? If each one of us would bring four women into the Auxiliary every Episcopal in the diocese would be helping."

Mrs. Walter Ruan, Educational Secretary of the Diocese, gave a most encouraging report of the educational work being done. Last year there were eighty-five study classes, not only more branches ordered the course for study; but ministers are using it for vestries. The demand for the Lending Library, carried on by our Educational Secretary, has been so great that five sets of the five dollar Lending Library have been ordered. This library is available on request to Mrs. Ruan, Petersburg, Va. A donation of fifty dollars from the Auxiliary was sent to Archdeacon Russell to be used for educational purposes in the Colored Convocation. Four boys and four girls were enabled to attend the Colored School of Religious Education, held in Lawrenceville, Virginia, in July.

At the recent meeting of the Synod held in Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, Mrs. Walter Whichard, of Norfolk, was made a member of the Committee on Constitution and By-Laws, and Mrs. Frank Holladay, of Suffolk, was elected one of three members to serve with the officers as the Executive Board of the Province of Washington.

The Bishop of the Diocese appointed Mrs. Frank Holladay, of Suffolk, President of the Auxiliary, her term beginning January 1, 1930.

The following new officers were elected: Mrs. Joseph Deal, Jr., Norfolk, Secretary; Mrs. E. H. Mitchell, Danville, Social Service Secretary. The other officers succeed themselves for another term.

Mrs. Frank Darling expressed the love and appreciation of Mrs. Walter Whichard, the retiring President, not only from each member of the Executive Board, but of the membership of the Auxiliaries of the diocese, her wise rulings, her deep sense of the power of the spiritual life, unfailing thought of others, having made her greatly beloved. Whichard was presented with a Prayer Book and Hymnal by the Board.

Mrs. Randolph Barksdale, of Petersburg, who this year completes ten years of splendid service as Custodian of the U. T. O., was presented also a Prayer Book by the Board.

NEEDS HOMES FOR CHILDREN.

The Virginia Department of Public Welfare needs homes today for eighty boys and girls. This Department is one of the largest child-caring agencies in the United States. The growing number of its child-wards makes urgent the need of foster homes. At the beginning of the past fiscal year 2,343 children were under the care of the Department. Within the year there have been 664 more boys and girls received. These children have been victims of unfortunate surroundings, where normal childhood has not been possible. Most of them have come untrained, many undernourished, and all of them have felt the lack of a secure home.

Each child is kept in a temporary boarding home until he has his physical and mental examinations, and his physical defects have been corrected. Usually he responds quickly to training. Within a short time he is ready for a permanent home with real parents. Some of the children are described below. If any residents of the State are interested in giving one of these or other similar children a home, the State Department of Public Welfare, Richmond, Va., will be delighted to hear from them.

John is an alert twelve-year-old boy, small for his age, with brown hair and keen eyes. He is polite, friendly and winning. His mother died a year ago and his father was unable to keep the family together. A relative took him for a short time, but could not care for him indefinitely on account of his large family and small income. With no real home John came to us unhappy and restless. Since he has been in one of our temporary boarding homes his face has brightened up. He is looking forward to having the care and protection of a good, permanent home. He needs the affection which his mother formerly gave him.

Jane is a leader among her companions. She takes part in both Sunday-school and school programs. She is a bright-eyed, fourteen-year-old brunette, very responsive. Her parents gave her to a relative several years ago. When the aunt could no longer provide for her properly she was sent to us. The whereabouts of her parents are unknown. Jane has reached the first year of high school. She is always willing to do her part.

The twinkle of Tom's eyes wins friends for him. He is an eleven-year-old youngster with blue eyes and red hair. He is bubbling over with energy, has plenty of curiosity and imagination, and is interested in all outdoor sports. He is counting the days until he is twelve and can be a Boy Scout. Both his parents are dead. He has won a place in the heart of his boarding mother. His smile and cheery disposition will bring sunshine into your home.

The more we know of the world, the more doubtfully we ask, "Can such a world be saved"? And the more we know of Christian nations, the more incredulously we ask, "Can these be the saviours"? But the more we know of Christ's Cross for ourselves, the less we can believe that any soul is outside its destined range.—P. T. Forsyth.

UNIVERSAL BIBLE SUNDAY

December 8, 1929

AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY

THE BOOK FOR THE DAY

The Bible is a personal letter written and addressed to reach every soul that will receive it in faith. For it does not matter what the promise is, or to whom given, or by whom written, or in what part of the Bible found, we take the Divine Word as if it were just written yesterday as a message to our soul from God. Perhaps it is a promise to Jacob, or a command to Joshua, or a word to Hezekiah or Isaiah or Peter or John. That doesn't matter. Any promise, anywhere, to anybody, is the believer's, and may be taken and claimed, and is taken and claimed by the individual believer for himself or herself. It is astonishing to a man whose eyes God has opened to find that this book, as Bettex says, instead of being a book of general religious interest, is a book that deals with him and his life. It is the Word of God for his soul. (Bettex, p. 138). The Bible goes to men of every colour, every clime, every code of ethics, and, like a master key that opens every door, it fits the universal human heart. "Why," said a dark-skinned son of the Orient, as he heard the Bible for the first time, "why, that is exactly what I want." It is what everybody wants; so in every land, in every continent, it is the Book for the day.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

We must not only carry on, we must carry through!

"Be grateful for your blessings and your trials will look small."

No work faithfully done has ever been wasted and no life truly lived has ever failed.

"When we work for God we work with Him."

Never open the New Testament till you have said to yourself: "Now, O my soul, proceed no further till we have set Him of whom we are now to read before us!" Never hear a chapter of the gospel read without seeing, as if you had been there, all that is read about! —Alexander Whyte.

"If God had to work with perfect instruments His Kingdom would never come."

Hearing and believing are two folds of a great door that leads to life eternal. We listen to Jesus because God sent Him. If Christ be only a reformer, a wise teacher, or a misguided enthusiast, our hope in Him is vain. There is no door. There is no life everlasting. But if He is the Son of God then His Gospel is the password to glory. Hear and believe and the gates will open wide.

I have lived long enough, and seen enough, to know that the difference between the Possible and the Impossible is that the impossible takes a little longer time.—From a statement by Dr. A. A. Fulton, veteran Presbyterian missionary.

"God keep us through the common days,
The level stretches white with dust,
When thought is tired, and hands upraise
Their burdens feebly, for they must.
In days of slowly fretting care
Then most we need the strength of prayer."
—Margaret E. Sangster.

When the sun rises , I go to work;
When the sun goes down, I take my rest;
I dig the well from which I drink;
I farm the soil that yields my food.
I share creation; kings do no more.
—Translated from Chinese by Y. S. Han

There are just two ways, after all, in which we can approach the problem of human relations. One is to approach it as if we were individuals. The other is to approach it as if we were members one of another. One is the way of suspicion and hatred and conflicting claims and war. The other is the way of passionate peace.

If the people who want to do good among the poor would give up patronizing them, would cease trying to convert them before they have gained the smallest personal influence with them, would visit them as those who have just as good right to be here as they have, it would be all the better for both, perhaps chiefly for themselves.—George Macdonald.

EDITORIALS

Vol. 94. RICHMOND, VA., DECEMBER 7, 1929. No. 49.

FUNDAMENTAL

"Fundamental," as most of us know, is from a root word signifying the foundation, origin, beginning. Christians are enjoined by the American Bible Society to use this time for special thought on the Bible. Therefore, it is well to consider the Bible as the fundamental and indispensable force and influence of our civilization, our government, individual character, the foundation on which they are established—a foundation made by and for the soul, impalpable, but stronger and more enduring than any stone or steel.

England, through more than nine hundred years, has been guided and ruled by the Bible, although the masses of the people, even the few able to read, were long debarred from it. The injunctions, warnings and promises of God, the commandments given through Moses, the life and teachings of Christ, were absorbed by the popular heart and made the written laws and the rules for conduct, whatever the crimes and follies of rulers and periods. The vilest kings were compelled to proclaim that they reigned "by the Grace of God". This republic, born of English blood and enterprise and tradition, was created and brought to independent life by the same guidance, on the same foundation. The first organized, formal, bold, threat of revolt, by representatives of the united colonies of North America, at Philadelphia in 1775, was accompanied by expression of "reverence for our Great Creator" and the meetings of the body were opened with humble and fervent prayer. The Virginia convention of May, 1776, appealed for vindication of its action to "the Searcher of All Hearts". The Declaration of Independence asserts rights to which the American people were entitled "by the laws of nature and of nature's God".

These two Bible built and founded nations are the dominant powers of the earth, with strength more enormous than the world has heretofore known; and they strive earnestly, as no former people ever have done, to do the will of God as proclaimed in His Holy Book and bring peace on earth and good will among men and universal government of the Golden Rule. These are the fundamentals. No substitute for them in giving hope for the future of humanity has been devised by the cunning of statesmen or the thought of philosophers, old or new.

Invention and discovery have multiplied the means for mutual destruction and by quicker and closer communication and contacts increased vastly occasions for strife. Means for preservation of life and prevention and relief of suffering also have been multiplied. The precepts and principles of the Bible, the fundamentals, give us all the promise we have that these products of human ingenuity and intelligence may be used for endless good instead of frightful disaster, the guidance to determine whether the mutual destruction shall be wrought or prevented, the closer contacts applied for brotherhood or ruinous discords. Human intellectual processes apart from Divine guidance have failed miserably through all history to assure tranquility, stability or permanent betterment for any; sometimes have torn men and nations from the spirit and meaning of Christianity to pervert the name of it to diabolic fanaticisms and hideous cruelties. Ancient civilization of long growth, apparently impregnable, flowering in grand architecture, exquisite art and deathless productions of giant minds, were obliterated with arrows and spears. Their profound thinkers and philosophers failed to save them. The French revolutionists, a hundred and forty years ago, set up a beautiful disreputable woman as Goddess of Pure Reason and worshipped her. Reason crazed as they were, they abandoned that orgy of horrible blasphemy in a few weeks; but, with thousands of intensely active minds working at plans for an actual Utopia, their structure of government collapsed and Waterloo came. Now, the largest city may be destroyed and an army of men slain in an hour. Those presenting themselves as intellectual leaders, rejecting the Bible, or thinking away from it, reach absurdly differing conclusions regarding the fate of our race and the paths we should follow. With uniform assumption of wisdom, depth of thought and width of scholarship, they inform us that mankind is hopelessly doomed to decadence, degradation and extinction; that mankind is destined to magnificent ascension to indefinite heights by mental alertness and concentration; that life inevitably is battle among individuals in which the weaker must be eliminated and the stronger left in triumphant possession of all; that the one cure for all ills is in taking from the strong and fortunate and giving to the weak and unfortunate, making a dead level. Other varieties tell us they have learned that the universe and man arose from protoplasm and microbe and vapor floating in space, accidentally, shaping themselves obedient to laws made by nobody; that there may be a Supreme Power and Creator, but giving no heed to the things created; that the Saviour was half Divine, half human; that He never existed. The confusions, contradictions, combinations, modifications, are endless.

In the Bible, for the ordinary mind, such as most of us have and must trust, there are no contradictions or confusions. It stands clear, simple, plain, direct, the staunch, trusty, foundation, the security and guide and fundamental law. All of us are like travellers in the night. We can not know, except for what the Bible tells us, whence nor how we came, what is remotely behind us or immediately or remotely before us. In the pages of that Book we find the stars glittering, giving light, showing the way onward. And the light and guidance are for the weakest, the strongest, the poorest, the richest, the most unlettered and the most learned of us.

By that light, on that foundation, the mother broods and yearns and dreams and builds for the child at her knee, tenderly inspiring the awakening soul with love and faith and hope to make usefulness and strength and happiness for time to come and after time shall end. On the foundation and in the light the aged and stricken rest, serenely confident of glorious deliverance presently and rich compensation for affliction patiently borne. There those in high station and fortune may learn to raise themselves and their hearts and souls ever higher by humility and earnest performance of the fundamental duties so clearly demanded of them. There the most degraded sinner, sincerely penitent, finds assurance of mercy and free forgiveness. In that light, on that foundation, thousands of unostentatious, self-sacrificing men, called to God's ministry and work, are doing that work, quietly and faithfully. These are not troubled with Greek or Hebrew roots, nor laborious peering for pretexts for theories of forgery or error or interpolation. Their souls know and tell them all they need or care to know. They consecrate themselves to alleviation of sorrow, to leading strayed souls to the fold of salvation, fighting vice, sustaining virtue, walking humbly and gratefully before their Maker, achieving gloriously for community, country and humanity, the present and the future, without noise or self-glorification.

Can hard, dry, conflicting, confusion of human reason or philosophizing, give such fruits as these, growing daily, continually, everywhere, from the fundamental faith and standards the Bible gives us?

The much-heralded profound thinkers and verbose writers, the blatant unbelievers, half-believers, scarce at all believers, strive and toil to take us from the straight, clear path we know and can see to dimness of doubt, to darkness, interminable and treacherous labyrinths of speculation, supposition, theory. Always there have been such. Generation after generation, century after century, they have rise n and gleamed the moment. They have vanished, like the froth on a wave, like wisps of mist in a valley. The fundamental foundation, made from and for the souls of men, stands unshaken. The light shines steadily and far.

OWEN D. YOUNG ENDORSES CAMPAIGN FOR STRATFORD HALL.

120 Broadway, New York
Room 2555

October 1, 1929.

Mrs. Emerson Root Newell,
Brookside Drive,
Greenwich, Connecticut.

My Dear Mrs. Newell:

I am glad that the Robert E. Lee Memorial Foundation has been organized to buy and to maintain Stratford Hall in Virginia for the benefit of the nation and the nation's guests. This ancient property—ancient from the American point of view, since it dates from 1729—was the home of Thomas Lee, an early Colonial Governor of Virginia and the birthplace of his sons, Richard Henry Lee and Francis Lightfoot Lee, who signed the Declaration of Independence. In addition Stratford was the home of Lighthorse Harry Lee and the birthplace of Robert E. Lee, who was not only a great military genius, but one of the most lovable and appealing characters in our history. It would be difficult indeed to find one house which has accumulated more historic memories. As a physical marker of American history, Stratford Hall is valuable indeed. To insure its perpetuation, we must take it out of private ownership and dedicate it to the public. A method of accomplishing that result in America is through the foresight and generosity of our individual citizens.

I congratulate you and your associates on the initiation of this worthy enterprise, and I have no doubt as to its receiving wide and generous support from our people.

Very respectfully yours,

Owen D. Young.

HYMN.

O Word of God Incarnate,
O Wisdom from on high,
O Truth unchanged, unchanging,
O Light of our dark sky;
We praise Thee for the radiance
That from the hallowed page,
A lantern to our footsteps,
Shines on from age to age.

The Church from her dear Master
Received the gift Divine,
And still that light she lifteth
O'er all the earth to shine.
It is the golden casket
Where gems of truth are stored,
It is the heaven-drawn picture
Of Christ, the living Word.

It floateth like a banner
Before God's host unfurled;
It shineth like a beacon
Above the darkling world;
It is the chart and compass,
That o'er life's surging sea,
'Mid mists, and rocks, and quicksands,
Still guides, O Christ, to Thee.

BIBLE QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

(Our readers are invited to send in their questions from time to time concerning Scriptural subjects in which they are perplexed or desire light. Our limited space necessitates brevity in questions, as well as in the answers which we will endeavor to maintain in strict accord with the Word of the Lord, which, after all, settles all argument. This column is therefore not for controversy, but for a testimony.)

Question No. 11.—Please explain why the preaching of some preachers is so directly opposite to that of others on the common subjects of the Bible, when all, it would seem, should agree."

Answer.—Your question leads us to a sad answer. A general departure from the truth is one of the forecasted conditions that shall mark the closing days of this present Church age; Satan even having his preachers in the pulpit (2 Cor. 11:15), and bringing in damnable heresies; even ridiculing our Lord's sacrificial death; as "raging waves of the sea, foaming out their own shame"; see 2 Peter 2:1; all of Jude; 1 Tim. 4:3. The "blood-test" is the one to be applied (Gal. 1:7-9). If they speak not according to this Word, there is no light in them (Isa. 8:20).

Question No. 12.—Is it correct as some teach, that there is not a thing we can do to insure our salvation apart from believing on the Lord Jesus Christ and receiving Him as our Saviour, and if so, why do we read so much about "works" and fruit-bearing in the Scripture?

Answer.—This teaching is quite correct. Why not let the Word of God decide the matter? "The gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord" (Rom. 6:23). For by grace are ye saved through faith, not of works, lest any man should boast (Eph. 2:8, 9).

The trouble is that so many of the Lord's dear ones fail to distinguish the great difference between "Salvation" and rewards for service. Works is a manifestation of "faith" (Jas. 1:18), and one of the "believer's" highest and unlimited privileges is that of being a co-laborer with God (1 Cor. 3:9-11). Even a "cup of cold water" does not remain unnoticed (Matt. 10:42). Every work shall be rewarded at our Lord's coming (Rev. 22:12).

FAVORITE SCRIPTURE VERSE.

(In this space each week will appear a favorite passage of Scripture as sent in by a different reader. Every one is, therefore, invited to send us their favorite verse. It is suggested all who can, join with the rest of us in committing to memory the verse which appears here each week, including its location in the Holy Book; and in due time your memory chest will be laden with choice, eternal treasures, indeed. "Thy word have I hid in my heart, that I might not sin against thee." Ps. 119:11.)

This week the following verse was submitted by

Mrs. A. C. Garrett, of Newport News, Virginia:

"Behold, He cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see Him; and they also which pierced him; and all kindreds of the earth shall wail because of Him. Even so. Amen." (Rev. 1:7.)

Who will send one from the far-away places as well as very near us?

THE NEW HUMANITY

Archdeacon of the Blue Ridge.

PART II.

The Divine Leadership of Christ.

THE next question that comes up for discussion is, as to whether there is any sign anywhere of a leadership which can in the least degree compare or compete with that of Jesus Christ?

In the first place, then, is there any nation which may be regarded as being entitled to the leadership of the world in human progress? The answer to this question is clear; America stands in the lead and is universally recognized as leader by the other nations of the world, on account of her population, wealth, natural resources and the constructive ability of her financial and industrial leaders.

This being so, what may be regarded as the watchword of her people; that, in fact, which they look upon as one of the most importance in their national life. The answer to this is Prosperity.

Prosperity, however, while it awakens the wonder and even envy of other nations, can not necessarily be shared by them. So far from this, some of them regard America as self-centered and as deriving part of her prosperity from the exaction of tribute from them. America, therefore, can hardly be considered as the Hope of the World, in this particular field.

Another notable characteristic of our American civilization is the strongly marked emphasis placed by our citizens on education. This is especially seen in the generosity shown by our men of wealth towards the equipment and endowment of our colleges and universities, since vast sums are being given year by year to these objects.

Do we find any signs of world leadership in this department of our national life, which seems to point the way to a higher and nobler civilization? So far from this being the case our leading educationalists do not appear to be able to agree as to the real meaning and purpose of education.

Some think that the preparation of young people for making a living is the main purpose of education. On the other hand some regard the training of the mind to understand and take advantage of the cultural inheritance which we have received from the past as the highest ideal of education. There are side issues, too, which influence a number of students, such as athletics, the social advantages of college life, and other interests of a similar kind.

In addition to the uncertainty which seems to prevail among educationalists as to the real meaning and purpose of education, there are some disquieting symptoms which have caused many good people a certain amount of anxiety lest their children should suffer harm to their religious faith, owing to the fact that many professors and instructors are not Christians; and that, therefore, their influence is likely to do harm instead of good.

A book that was published some years ago gave the views of a number of college professors on the questions of the existence of a personal God and the immortality of the soul. The number of those who answered one or both of these questions in the negative was quite considerable, which would seem to justify the feeling of many parents that there was a certain amount of risk in sending their children to some of our colleges and universities.

For the years at college are the specially formative ones, when the course is generally laid out for the voyage of life; and since young people are very apt to be influenced for good or ill by their teachers, the absence of any faith in God or in the future life, on the part of those to whom they look for guidance, would seem to seriously affect the value of such an education; since we cannot fail to be reminded of the words of Christ: "If the blind lead the blind, both shall fall into the ditch."

We turn now to Natural Science whose conquests in the sphere of Nature, and whose opening up of new paths to a life lived on a higher plane, so far as material things are concerned, seem to entitle her to bear the torch of human progress in the leadership of the world.

This hope did burn brightly in the hearts of many up to the time of the Great War, but when that disaster overtook civilization it was discovered that Science herself was able and willing to contribute the chief share in making it the most terrible and deadly conflict the world had ever seen. Up to that time war had, as a rule, merely inflicted flesh wounds, as it were, upon civilization; whereas this last war has revealed very clearly that when it is allied with Science, it is capable of inflicting a mortal wound on civilized humanity. At the close of the war America had in her possession a supply of poison gas sufficient to destroy every human being in the Western Hemisphere, and this would have been used with terrible results in Europe in 1919 if the war had not come to an end.

One would certainly have thought that the experience of the war would have been sufficient to have prevented any further continuance of an alliance which seemed to threaten the very existence of civilization; but it would seem that our chemists are still at work, generating more deadly gasses still, capable even of wiping out whole armies, to say nothing of the civil population. From this it would seem that Science herself bears unconscious witness to the world's need of the benignant rule of the Prince of Peace.

What has been said does not, however, imply any reflection on the men of science as a whole, for probably the great majority of them are men of peace and deplore the way in which Science has been compelled, for patriotic reasons, to contribute in so large a measure to the terrors of war. But the results of scientific research are at the disposal of mankind generally, and while they are being used to wonderfully bless and enrich mankind, they can also be used to bring widespread calamity and destruction upon the world.

It would be unfair also to ignore the efforts which have been and are being made in the cause of Peace by America; but while the leading governments of the world, America included, feel it necessary to spend so large a proportion of their incomes on self defense, and the difficulties in the way of any really drastic limitation of armament seems so far distant, war cannot be said to be a thing of the past.

What has been so far said seems to reveal the fact that the resources of civilization, even when allied to the intelligence of mankind, are not sufficient to bring in a new day of hope and blessing to the world. Even America, generally recognized as she is, to be the foremost nation of the world, endowed, too, with numbers of men of the greatest executive ability, seems entirely inadequate to the task of leading mankind into the Promised Land of a higher and nobler civilization.

It would seem, therefore, to be the duty and privilege of the Christian Church to bear a clear and united witness to the truth that Jesus Christ, the Son of God, is the Divine Leader, who alone has the wisdom and power capable of bringing in a reign of peace and happiness to the world.

St. Paul in his day saw clearly the vision which the Church of God might well set forth before the men and women of our own day. This vision is described by him in the first chapter of his Epistle to the Ephesians, where he says: "Having made known unto us the mystery of His will according to His good people which He has purposed in Himself: that in the dispensation of the fulness of times He might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are on earth; even in Him."

At the present time the world is in a state of unrest and unsettlement and the question is being passed from one to another, among the leading thinkers of our time, namely, Whither? That is to say: "Whither are we being borne on the ocean of time since we are none of us in possession of any definite plan or purpose which would serve as a pillar of cloud and fire to lead us through this present wilderness of uncertainty and unfulfilled desires and aspirations to what the prophet of old described as the New Jerusalem."

The Church alone can give the answer to this question, and it is that everything depends upon whether we are ready and willing to accept Christ as our Leader. Without His leadership civilization will drift on without aim or purpose towards certain dissolution. If, however, men are willing to accept Christ as their Leader; then it will be their duty and work of service to bring their lives and everything which they can control or influence into harmony with His will and purpose: Human life and society will then be instinctively drawn by the laws of moral and spiritual gravitation into close and intimate union with Christ as the centre of a new and higher order of existence, as He himself foretold, when He said, "I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me."

OUR RULERS AND THE BOOK OF BOOKS

IN anticipation of Universal Bible Sunday, to be observed on Sunday, December 8, the American Bible Society sent a letter to the President of the United States and to the Governors of all the States of the Union asking for a personal testimony to the Bible and an expression of opinion on the value of Universal Bible Sunday. The replies to these letters were so warm-hearted and so revealing that the American Bible Society desires to share them with as many as possible.

As their length precludes printing the letters in full, only the salient paragraphs are given:

The President of the United States—Herbert Hoover: The annual observance of Universal Bible Sunday is a valuable aid in spreading knowledge of the Book of Books, from the pages of which have come those ideals that root our government and our national life firmly in the consciences of men and women.

Governor J. C. Phillips of Arizona: I think the movement to establish Universal Bible Sunday is a most commendable one. I was a Bible student early in my life and during most of the later years have taught a Bible class.

Governor C. D. Buck of Delaware: To me the importance of the Book of Books lies in the helpfulness to the general cultivation of character which knowledge of its contents gives, although mere knowledge of itself is not sufficient to insure proper character attitudes.

Governor D. E. Carlton of Florida: Opportunity will be given the people of the United States on Sunday, December 8, to learn more of the greatest Book in history—the Holy Bible. On this day the churches throughout America are to observe and preach its teachings. It is important to every phase of advancement of mankind that this day be one in which the Word of God is sought and I cannot stress to too great a degree the importance that all sections of the United States take part.

Governor H. C. Baldridge of Idaho: The more I observe the activities of men, the more thoroughly I become convinced that a literal interpretation and application of Christ's teachings would solve all the problems of society. The observance of Bible Sunday, December 8, should serve to call effectively to the attention of all people the fundamental truths of life that the Bible reveals.

Governor H. G. Leslie of Indiana: The biggest influence in the lives of men today is the open Bible. No man's education is complete without a good working knowledge of the Bible. Its influence upon individuals and society is so marked that the outstanding men and nations of today are those whose lives and actions most clearly conform to its teaching. It is most fitting and proper that we devote a day to contemplation of its worth to humanity.

Governor C. M. Reed of Kansas: That thousands of pastors on Sunday, December 8, in all sections of the United States will preach to their congregations on the Bible and urge a more faithful study of its truths is a noble achievement whose influence will radiate to every part of the world. I am pleased to give not alone my endorsement but I know I convey to the American Bible Society the hope and wish of the people of Kansas that this event may mark an epoch in a greater and wider search for the truths and blessings promised in the pages of this good Book.

Governor W. T. Gardiner of Maine: The ministry of the Bible to individuals and to humanity holds a significant place, unique in the foundation of our country's history and foremost as a factor contributing to its greatness and success. We may well stress the value of lessons to be gained from its study.

Governor F. G. Allen of Massachusetts: I welcome the opportunity of endorsing Universal Bible Sunday and I find it very difficult to express in words the high appreciation and value I place upon the Holy Bible. The Book has exerted a tremendous influence upon the destinies of the World—a greater influence than any of us realize. No one of the Christian faith cares to contemplate what the world would be without the Bible. It is the foundation and cornerstone of our Christian faith and worship.

Governor A. C. Ritchie of Maryland: The Bible has always preceded civilization on the latter's progress in the world. It has been the missionary, the outpost of every advance of mankind. It is the great comfort and solace and strength of both the strong and the weak. The observance of Universal Bible Sunday is altogether praiseworthy and important and I consider it a privilege to endorse the occasion.

Governor F. W. Green of Michigan: If we could instill into the minds and hearts of people on earth that faith which was in the bosom of the wise men of the East who followed the star to the manger, where reposed the Redeemer of mankind, the world would be a better place in which to live. The Bible is the greatest agency for the teaching of this faith which is so necessary for the future preservation of our spiritual and national life.

Governor Theodore Christianson of Minnesota: So much of the thought of the world centers about the Bible, so much literature makes allusions to it, so many of our institutions are based upon its teachings, and our civilization is so closely tied up to it, that no man, whether believer or non-believer, can question its right to be considered as the greatest of all books.

Governor R. C. Dillon of New Mexico: The Bible is undoubtedly the greatest book ever written. The reading of it should be encouraged and there should be a copy of it in every home.

Governor F. D. Roosevelt of New York: I feel that a comprehensive study of the Bible is a liberal education for any one. Nearly all of the great men of our country have been well versed in teachings of the Bible and I sincerely hope that the habit of Bible study will be developed among the people.

Governor O. Max Gardner of North Carolina: The great benefits which I have derived personally from a study of the Bible prompt me to endorse whole-heartedly the suggestion for the celebration of a Universal Bible Sunday.

Governor M. Y. Cooper of Ohio: The practice of each year devoting a day to emphasize the ministry and help which the Book has afforded millions must appeal to every thinking person. Covering as it does a range of subjects as wide as humanity itself, the Book compasses within its pages the circumference of human experience. Study of its verses has provided inspiration for the greatest of the nation's leaders and comfort to mankind everywhere.

Governor H. S. Johnston of Oklahoma: The law of "survival of the fittest" should and does place the Bible first in all literature. The remorseless ravages of time, the mutations of civilization, the desolation of empires, the crumbling of the works of man, leave the Bible undisturbed.

Governor J. S. Fisher of Pennsylvania: Our Nation receives its moral tone from the Word of God. This applies to professors and non-professors alike. An increased knowledge of the Bible will strengthen the moral quality of the people. The more Bible we have the less law we will need. In a higher sense, the observance of this day will lead to great benefits to all the churches by a spiritual revival resulting from a renewed and intensified interest in the Holy Book.

Governor N. S. Case of Rhode Island: The Bible, the Book of Books, is my guide and that of my family, day by day, throughout the year.

Governor J. G. Richards of South Carolina: The Bible is the only Book that lies at all times upon my desk in the Executive offices of South Carolina and it is my light and guide as I try to do the difficult work that confronts me as Governor of this great State.

Governor R. H. Hartley of Washington: There is not anything more needed in America today than righteousness among the people. No book will have a more righteous effect upon the reader than the Holy Bible. Therefore, any effort that is put forth that will cause people to read this "Book of the Law" will be a benefit to the nation.

Governor F. C. Emerson of Wyoming: Throughout the centuries the Bible has remained the Book of Books. It is well that the importance of the Bible should be emphasized for folks are too prone to overlook the great values which will come to them through study and contemplation of the beautiful and helpful ideals which find expression in the Holy Book.

THY WORD IS LIFE.

In connection with the One Hundred and Twentieth Anniversary of the New York Bible Society, which will be held on Bible Sunday afternoon, December 8, at four o'clock, in the Evangelical Lutheran Church of the Holy Trinity, Central Park West and Sixty-fifth Street, New York, the following Hymn has been written by Dr. Ralph Welles Keeler. This Hymn will be sung on the special occasion to the tune of "Canonbury":

The weaving of our city's life
Is rich with threads of fine spun gold.
From hearts that in Thy deathless Word
Have learned the truth through ages told.

Thy Word is Life, O God above,
And grows in power from hearts that know
The beauty of Thy boundless love,
A heavenly kingdom here below.

For those, who pass Thy torch along
To souls that blindly grope for light,
We thank Thee, while we pray that all
May see afar Thy vision bright.

O may Thy Word transform and bless
The lives of all who touch our shore.
That brotherhood, and peace, and love
May reign supreme forever more.

Book Reviews

THE REUNION OF CHRISTENDOM: Edited by Sir James Marchant, K. B. E., LL. D. Contributions by Cardinal Bourne, Archbishop of Westminster in behalf of the Roman Communion; Archbishop Germanos of the Greek Church; Bishop Dibelius, concerning the Protestant Churches in Germany; Archbishop Soderblom of Sweden; the Lord Bishop of Winchester of the Church of England; Dr. Garvie of the Free Church in England; Dr. Lidgett of the Wesleyan Methodist Church; Dr. Martin as to Church Union in Scotland; Bishop Manning of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States; Dr. Brown as to the Churches of the United States; Dr. Moore of the United Churches in Canada; the Lord Bishop of Dornakal, regarding the Anglican Church in India; the volume concluding with a chapter by Dr. Orchard of London, England, on "A Vision of the Reunited Church." Cloth. Pp. 329. Published by Henry Holt and Company, New York City. Price, $3.00.

The above contents will satisfy the reader of the wealth of matured judgment within the covers of this book. Not the least significant feature of the volume is the editorship of Sir James Marchant, whose previous contributions to the field of Christian literature have won him friends universally. And we must all respond to the motives of both editor and contributors. We are attendant upon any challenging voice that shall call us to the solution of the problem of "our unhappy divisions".

Whether any organic union is possible remains to be seen, as the pages of this interesting experiment unfold. There are pros and cons as to what has already been accomplished. Certainly, the call of the day is for more consideration of those not wholly one with us. If it be in the matter of orders, can we be lenient to see and appreciate the compensating spiritual values that accompany the lives of those who are not in accord with us? If it be that of ceremonial which offers an entangling question, can we submit that it can be made efficacious in the culture of the spiritual life, however, widely we may differ with those who practice it? Whatever the divergence between us and the others, is there no basis by which we may admire the good in them and exemplify the Apostolic axiom, "We know that we have passed from death to life, because we love the brethren?"

An humble undertaking is being tried in New England at present to prove the possibility of union on spiritual grounds. All denominational distinctions are obliterated in the longing for fellowship in the spirit. Every conference thus far has resulted one strong aspiration to make this movement effectual in widening circles. We may believe that if such an undertaking shall offer its contribution to the solution of the enigma, the way to more comprehensive reunion will have been paved. For mutual sympathy will go a long distance towards removing formidable barriers. To love the one supreme Redeemer and all His as our very own, is to get where we may meet on the premises of His own will for us. We are what we are, in most instances, because of inheritance, environment, or providences which have shaped our pathway. Any air of superiority ill becomes us in this day of increasing tolerance.

Intelligent Christians will welcome this volume as indicating the onward trend from narrow sectarian exclusiveness. Bishop Anderson's matchless prayer is most fitting for us all: "O God of peace, who through Thy Son Jesus Christ, didst set forth one faith for the salvation of mankind, send Thy grace and heavenly blessing upon all Christian people who are striving to draw nearer to Thee and to each other in the unity of the Spirit, and in the bond of peace."

PROGRESS AND RELIGION: By Christopher Dawson. Cloth. Pp. 250. Published by Longmans, Green and Company, New York City. Price, $4.00.

A valuable treatise concerning the rise and development of the influences that have made for the advancement of the race. From ancient China to modern Europe the reader is carried in enlightening paragraphs. We are made to see how the primitive instincts of man found religious expression in the attitude of reverence to powers beyond him and which he came eventually to designate as gods; how the thinking Greeks emerged from polytheism into the more reasonable concept of God, which found a ready mode of expression in the ultimate Christian revelation.

That which most engrosses us is the treatment of the present order and the possible outcome of existing conditions. We are stimulated to wonder when we are informed that secular progress was not born of the rise of Protestantism, but solely through the renaissance. But we are quite in accord with the author's contention that progress depends upon the admission of the culture of spirituality. Our Christianity has suffered by the hurly-burly of modern life. We do not think seriously, if we think at all; we do not take time to be contemplative of spiritual matters. We are too engrossed in the everlasting problem, "Will it pay?" "Is it worth while?" And we must agree with deep sympathy in his contention that where there is no religion there is no culture. Impressively does the author aver that European unity can be attained only by the fulfilment, not of an ultimate superstate, but by the creation of a spiritual society. And associated with this contention is the suggestion that city life tends to disruption and that a return to nature will in a large degree infuse into society the normal attitude towards the realization of the highest ideals of progress. Far too much has the urban charm allured men away from the springs of true living. Not the soggy, brainless, loutish life, which is sometimes caricatured in novel and play; but that wholesome love of God's creation which inspires reverence and awakens intelligent comprehensions of the power and kindliness of Deity. But, of course, finding God in nature, cannot satisfy man's religious instincts. That conclusion is held by all thoughtful reasoners. A revelation is requisite. And we have it, thank God.

FOUR-SQUARE: THE STORY OF A FOUR-FOLD LIFE: By John Rathbone Oliver. The Macmillan Company. Price, $2.50.

Here is the revelation of a noble soul. It is a fascinating book, and you will read it through. There is a healthy quality in it. It stimulates and strengthens faith and hope. You accompany the author on a journey from home and back again. And all the time he wins your love and sympathy. If some of the extreme so-called modernists would take the journey with him, they might come to know the real Lord of our Life, the God of love who cares for the lives of His children, and who enables His servants to serve Him.

Here is a man up-to-date in all his thoughts and works —but not a "modernist". He holds firmly to the fundamentals of the faith, without being a "fundamentalist". He lives by the faith and practice of the Holy Catholic Church, but is neither Romanist, nor the other extreme. Then what is he? From the book one gathers that he is an humble member of the Body of Christ, rejoicing in the sustaining power of His Life, always conscious of His spiritual Presence.

It is a thrilling story by a man and about a man who is a physician, a criminologist, a scholar, a university professor, and a priest. I commend it to any one who is tired of the trash that pours from the printing press,to any one who would be entertained and interested in human souls in the lower strata of life. It stirs the deeps of the soul to behold the miseries of mankind. It is inspiring to know what they may become by the power of God. And we rejoice to see what one man has been doing to bring men into a closer fellowship with their Father in Heaven. There is nothing stale about the book. It is pulsating with life.

AN INSPIRATION.

Mr. Editor:

I want to add a personal word about your friend, Dr. Glazebrook. His meeting with us was an inspiration. The men's meeting was held in the Y. W. C. A. building; the ministers and laymen of all Bisbee Churches were invited, and many of them came; and those who stayed away will never know what they missed. If. Dr. Glazebrook maintains everywhere as high a standard of service as he gave us here he will make an indelible impress upon the Church's laymen, and I want his many friends in the East to know what he is doing for us in the West. His is a valuable contribution to the Church's work.

REVOLUTION, NOT COMPREHENSION, THE AIM OF ANGLO-CATHOLICIZING.

Mr. Editor:

In two issues of The Living Church during the past summer were two articles which may be considered as accurate views of those who seek to do away with the Protestant character of the Protestant Episcopal Church. The writer of this article considers himself a good Catholic as measured by the Thirty-nine Articles and the Prayer Book of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

One of the correspondents, July 13, 1929, makes the following statements:

"Much as we all value our independence from the See of Rome, there are some among us who believe that the Reformers of the Sixteenth Century had no right to break up the unity of Christendom, to forbid the devotion of our forefathers, and to mutilate our ancient liturgy."

The author of these words fails entirely to see that the Church of England at the Reformation was only claiming her rightful position as a truly National Catholic Church in breaking the shackles, which in the face of her many protests, enslaved her to the Roman Church. She did not "break the unity of Christendom" by cutting loose from the Pope, and by reforming her Doctrine and Liturgy in agreement with the Primitive Church. She did not "mutilate our ancient liturgies by purging the ancient liturgies of superstitions which then, and today, are proclaimed as "Catholic", but are not found in the primitive liturgies, until they were corrupted by these additions, i. e., Transubstantiation, Mariolatry, obedience to the Pope, worship of the saints, etc., which are not "Catholic" doctrines—but Roman superstitions.

Again the writer says: "The scheme, then, of our so-called Romanizers is not to deliver this Church bodily into the hands of the Roman Catholic Church, but to restore first of all in toto our Catholic and Apostolic heritage which the Reformers, because of their prejudice against everything Catholic, willfully tried to discontinue, etc."

This is a serious charge. Let us see if it is true. Were the Reformers destroyers of everything Catholic? Not of Primitive Catholic Doctrine and Ritual. Did they not retain the Threefold Ministry? Did they not retain a truly Catholic Liturgy, purged of its superstitious additions? Did they not retain decent vestments, only dropping those that connoted a sacrificing Priesthood?

I suppose the writer's conception, as quoted above, is to bring back the Roman Mass, Mariolatry, a Sacrificing Priesthood, etc., all of which are Roman Catholic, but not truly Catholic. How unfounded, then, are these definitions of the writer, if he truly accepts true Church Teaching.

Another correspondent, in the issue of July 20, 1929, writing on this same subject of Romanizing, in part of his article does a really good service in rebuking lawless Bishops, Presbyters and Deacons, and Laity. He is, by his own statement, a newcomer. He uses this language: "We have a perfectly sound and dignified Anglican use, and unless I have misunderstood what appears to me to be perfectly clear rubrical instructions, can, as good Anglicans and loyal Episcopalians, rigidly adhere to the ritual and ceremonies of 1549." May I remind my new brother that the "use" of this Protestant Episcopal Church, is not the Ritual of 1549, the First Prayer Book of Edward VI., but it is the Second Book of Edward VI., with its Anglican additions, and the Revisions by the Protestant Episcopal Church, in her General Conventions from 1789 to 1928. The Prayer Book of 1928 is the Liturgy of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and not that of 1549. The Anglican Church in her Ritual has no more legal authority in the American Protestant Episcopal Church, than an act of the English Parliament in our National Life.

SEPARATE WEEKLY.

Mr. Editor:

Your article on Stonewall Jackson was most inspiring. Your paper is a wonderful spiritual and educational institution. I believe the time is coming when you will have to issue either a separate weekly, or get out a monthly, for how you can get all the cream of spiritual and educational themes in your weekly paper is beyond my conception.

God bless you.

THE TRUTH.

Mr. Editor:

I am more and more impressed with the truth that the power of the Church depends upon the emphasis which she places upon the Divinity of Christ; making it secondary to His humanity, results in the lessening in the power of the Church to do her proper work.

Ivy Depot, Virginia. F. W. Neve.

PARAGRAPH 3, ARTICLE 8.

Mr. Editor:

I have read with interest and surprise the letter of Mr. Langbourne M. Williams, in Southern Churchman, November 23, 1929, regarding the gathering together of a number of clergymen (of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America), in New York for the purpose of promoting Church unity. I am surprised, because it is almost unbelievable to imagine thirteen clergymen of the Episcopal Church meeting for the purpose of promoting Church unity, and then in the course of that meeting to pass and send a resolution to the Bishop of a Diocese criticising him for an act justifiable and in accordance with the laws of the Church.

I note that these gentlemen cite Canon Twenty, which states: "No minister in charge of any congregation of this Church, or Church Wardens, Vestrymen or Trustees of the congregation, shall permit any person to officiate therein, without evidence of being duly licensed; provided that nothing shall be construed as to forbid communicants of the Church, lay readers, etc. The rector and vestry can do nothing contrary to the Constitution.

I wonder if these thirteen gentlemen have ever read over Paragraph Three, Article Eight, of the Constitution of the Protestant Episcopal Church?

Article Eight, Paragraph Three, states that: No person ordained by a Bishop not in Communion with this Church shall be permitted to officiate as a minister of the Church until he shall have complied with the Canon or Canons in that case and also shall have subscribed the aforesaid decleration.

Declaration, Article Eight, Paragraph Two, Constitution: "I do believe the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament to be the Word of God, and to contain all things necessary to salvation: and I do solemnly engage to conform to the Doctrine, Discipline, and Worship of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America."

Has Mr. Coffin made this declaration?

Who, but one who has been ordained in accordance with these Canons and this Constitution can officiate as a minister of the Church?

This is not meant to cast any reflection on Mr. Coffin, or his Church, but it is meant to unequivocally call to the serious attention of the thirteen Presbyters of the Episcopal Church who have so forgotten their solemn obligations as to criticise, yea, condemn, Bishop Manning for performing an official act in keeping with his office and incumbent upon him. In parliamentary law, a Canon or amendment does not conflict with or supersede the Constitution. The laws must first be abolished before any change can be made. No matter what one feels, loyalty to one's obligation is the first consideration.

Universal Bible Sunday.

Universal Bible Sunday, to be observed this year on Sunday, December 8, is sponsored by the American Bible Society in order that through a simultaneous emphasis churchgoing Christians may be reminded of the value of the Scriptures and may be encouraged to a more faithful use of the Book of Books.

The American Bible Society is an interdenominational missionary organization whose sole object is "to encourage a wider circulation of the Holy Scriptures without note or comment." Its work is threefold:

Translation into the common dialects. Translation is a long and costly process.

Publication in styles convenient for the people and at lowest cost. Single Gospels are sold for one cent each.

Distribution by gifts and sales without purpose of profit. The cost of Scriptures given as grants and the expenses of colporteurs and other workers must be secured from friends of the Bible Cause.

The expenses of the Society in carrying on its world-wide work aggregate over a million and a quarter dollars a year. Voluntary gifts, whether large or small, are welcomed and may be sent to the Treasurer, American Bible Society, Bible House, Astor Place, New York City.

British and Foreign Bible Society.

This Society just celebrated its one hundred and twenty-fifth anniversary. Its annual output was exhibited in a new slant that shows its phenomenal growth thus:

Five years after its foundation the society sent out an average of nine volumes every hour in the year;

After fifty years it sent out 156 volumes per hour;

When it was one hundred years old the society sent out 650 volumes every hour;

And last year, its one hundred and twenty-fifth, the output averaged 1,301 volumes every hour!

The Rt. Rev. Dr. Frank A. McElwain, Bishop of Minnesota, and the Rt. Rev. Dr. W. H. Overs will present the Bishop-elect.

The Rt. Rev. Dr. Granville Baylord Bennett, Bishop of Duluth, will preach the ordination sermon.

The Rev. Dr. Charles L. Pardee, Church Missions House, New York, is the registrar.

1809-1929—One Hundred and Twentieth Anniversary of the New York Bible Society.

For centuries the third Sunday before Christmas, the second Sunday in Advent, has been observed as Bible Sunday. Through the continued efforts of the New York Bible Society, this Sunday has been officially recognized as Bible Sunday by nearly every leading denomination in New York, by many Bible Societies, and by the International Sunday-school Association.

The special Anniversary Service for the Society will be held in the Holy Trinity Lutheran Church, Eighth Avenue and Sixty-fifth Street, New York, on Bible Sunday afternoon, December 8, at four o'clock.

The Rev. Paul Scherer, D. D., pastor of the church, will deliver the Anniversary address for the Society.

New Presiding Bishop Asks Prayers of the Church for National Council Meeting.

The meeting of the National Council (and its departments) on December 10-12, will be the last meeting of the Council in 1929, and the first meeting at which I shall have the privilege of presiding. This December meeting is one of unusual importance.

May I ask my brethren of the clergy and laity to pray for me and for our National Council that we may be rightly guided in the tasks committed to us by the Church.

Charles P. Anderson,
Presiding Bishop and President of the National Council.
November 29, 1929.

Resolution Adopted for Missionary Support.

At the Eleventh Provincial Synod of Washington recently assembled in Harrisburg, the following was unanimously adopted:

Whereas: At the opening of this Synod our Presiding Officer, the Bishop of West Virginia, solemnly called attention to the fact that "our chief duty of this Synod is to face the financial condition of the Church and to discover, if possible, the cause of the apparent lack of interest in the support of Missionary Work", therefore, be it

Resolved: That a Committee of three Bishops, three Presbyters, three Laymen and three Members of the Woman's Auxiliary be appointed by the Chair to meet and suggest such remedies as seem best to them for arousing and enlisting larger support for the Missionary Work of the Church, and to report the same to the President of the Synod who will transmit their conclusions to the different diocese of this Province and to the National Council through its representative.

At a meeting of this committee held in the City of Washington on November 12, 1929, the following preamble resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Whereas: The supreme purpose of the Church is to extend the Kingdom of God among men as expressed in our Lord's great missionary commission; and

Whereas: In the Constitution of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America as adopted by the General Convention held in Philadelphia in the year 1835, it was stated in Article II that "The Society shall be considered as comprehending all persons who are members of this Church"; and

Whereas: Such action has never been taken with regard to any other Department of Church activity, thus expressing the Church's opinion with reference to the supreme importance of Missions; therefore, be it

Resolved: That while we as members of the Synod of the Province of Washington pledge ourselves to do our best towards meeting the apportionments of the National Council in our respective dioceses, and trust that the quota will be fully met, yet we respectfully request that if there be a deficiency in any year that the necessary reductions be made in the other Departments than the Department of Missions, so that as far as possible the Budget for the Department of Missions as adopted by the General Convention be maintained; and be it further,

Resolved: That this Special Committee of the Province of Washington herewith respectfully requests and urges upon all the members of the Province of Washington to do their utmost to meet the present deficit that menaces so seriously the Church's Missionary Work.

Thos. J. Bigham,
Secretary of the Synod.

Japanese Divinity Students Visit Leper Colony.

Three young students in the Divinity School in South Japan, too far from home to return there during the Christmas holidays last year, were asked by Bishop Lea to undertake a missionary journey to the Island of Tanegashima, where the Japanese Church has mission work. Their special object was to visit the lepers on the island. The climate is supposed to be good for sufferers from leprosy, so that their number is larger than in some other parts of Japan. The island is forty-five miles long and about ten miles wide. The three students divided it into sections and went off separately, meeting at intervals to compare reports.

The lepers live in miserable little huts, and hide themselves as much as possible. They have spent what little money they had on patent medicines, without results. It required much patience and tact on the part of the students to reach them with a Christian message and with the information that new methods of treating the disease hold out some hope. A clergyman on the island some years ago had made arrangements to have the lepers visit a doctor on the island, for injections, but through ignorance and fear few have done so. The doctor himself believes that the Christian message must be delivered first, and urged the students to find a Christian worker for these sufferers.

The names of the three students were Paul and Barnabas and John. Two were from the northern island of Hokkaido, and the third came from Brazil.

The American Bible Society.

In the circulation of the Scriptures during 1928, the American Bible Society by going beyond the 11,000,000 mark in its issues of Scriptures surpassed all previous records of distribution. The distribution was made in one hundred and eighty-two languages. This achievement, announced in the Society's one hundred and thirteenth annual report, marks the fourth year in succession in which the Bible circulation of each preceding year has been exceeded.

In China the American Bible Society distributed over 4,500,000 volumes, the largest circulation in the history of the Society's work in China. The new Bible House in Peking, the gift to the American Bible Society from the Maryland Bible Society, was formally dedicated "to the circulation of the Holy Scriptures among the people of China." This finely equipped modern building will facilitate a more efficient Bible distribution in the area which Peking serves.

The Society also reports multiplying opportunities for larger Scripture distribution in the republics of Latin-America. In the West Indies Agency demands for Scriptures were largely from those who were not affiliated with the churches, a definite campaign resulting in the greatest circulation in ten years. Bible coaches are being used increasingly by the Society's Agency in the Argentine to reach remote places in Uruguay and Paraguay, that the Bible may be made available to those not yet reached by the Bible workers. In Mexico the demand for Bibles is greater than the supply. Many requests received by the Society's agency in Mexico City were from the rural districts, in part the result of the government's establishment of an unprecedented number of schools attended day and night by children and grown people.

In the work of publication the American Bible Society continues to publish Bibles, Testaments and Portions. It reports the completion of its so-called "Penny Portion" series of the books of the New Testament. The entire New Testament may now be secured in eleven small volumes, each having an artistic colored cover and selling at one cent apiece. The Society also issues Scriptures in more than thirty languages in the so-called "diglot" form in which the foreign language and the English appear in parallel columns happily bridging for the foreign-born the gap between the language of his fatherland and the language of his adopted country, as well as serving English-speaking persons who seek to master other languages.

In the Arabic Levant Agency, with headquarters at Cairo, publication was increased two hundred and fifty per cent over that of the previous year. So great was the demand for the Scriptures that not a single copy of the Gospel could be procured in Cairo for four or five months. The plates of the Turkish Bible owned by the American Bible Society have recently been rendered obsolete by the Turkish ruling on the alphabet, whereby the Arabic script must be replaced by Latin characters. Not a vestige of the Arabic script is allowed in the grade schools. Drummers have gone through the streets and villages all over the Republic of Turkey calling upon every one between the ages of sixteen and forty, to attend the special classes opened for them. Thus, millions of people will soon be able to read the Scriptures who could not have done so twelve months ago. The American Bible Society plans to replace as promptly as possible the Turkish Scriptures in a new and approved text in the new script.

According to reports received from the Society's ten agencies working in the United States, there are still many homes with no knowledge of the Bible. Throughout the northwest Bible workers found grown children who had never seen a Bible and had never been inside of a church. In the middle west, men visited over 22,000 families and found 3,000 Bibleless homes. These were supplied with the Scriptures. In the Southern States many young people were reached in sections of the country largely destitute as regards religious and educational opportunities. Reading classes have been formed with the chief text-book a large print Testament supplied by the Society. The pupils range in age from twenty to eighty years. During the year systematic effort was made by the Society's agency working in the southwest to place a Bible in every home and church where copies had been lost or destroyed by the water and mud of the Mississippi flood.

Publication, for the first time, of the following translations will be made soon by the Society: the four Gospels in Kuskokwim, a dialect spoken by an Eskimo tribe in southwestern Alaska; the four Gospels in Hopi, for use among the Indians of that name in Arizona; and the Psalm in Bolivian Quechua, the tongue of one of the native peoples of Bolivia. Other translations and revisions of the Scriptures are in process.

The American Bible Society began its ministry of providing embossed Scriptures for the blind in 1853. During the subsequent years approximately 75,000 volumes of the Scriptures in Braille and other systems have been issued to persons deprived of sight. During 1928, the Society was able to reduce the selling price of embossed Scriptures by exactly one-half.

Mrs. Hobart E. Studley.

A cable brings word of the death of Mrs. Hobart E. Studley of the Philippine Mission staff, in Manila, on November 28. She and her husband had arrived in Manila on September 30, returning after a furlough which had been delayed because of the difficulty in getting some one to relieve them, and before they finally got away, Mrs. Studley had worked very hard, to the detriment of her health. They have two daughters, married, in the United States.

Mrs. Studley, who was Edith J. Halbrow, was born in Rutherford, New Jersey, in 1872. She attended public schools in New York, and later studied art. She was confirmed in St. Augustine's Chapel, Trinity Parish, New York. She went out to join Mr. Studley in China.

The Rev. Mr. Studley is senior missionary in length of service on the Philippine staff, serving there since 1903. He went to China in 1896 as a missionary of the Dutch Reformed Church, and was married in 1898. He was confirmed by Bishop Graves, ordained by Bishop Brent, and since 1903 he and Mrs. Studley have been building up St. Stephen's Chinese Church and School. From the earliest years the buildings have been over-crowded, and the fact that the Chinese there use a southern dialect has made additional workers hard to obtain.

Dr. Gates Elected Dean.

The Board of Trustees of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, New York City, unanimously elected the Rev. Dr. Milo H. Gates as Dean of the Cathedral, on the nomination of Bishop Manning. The resolution adopted by the trustees, November 25, was carried in the local newspapers and declares:

"The trustees hereby express their great satisfaction at this nomination and confirm it by acclamation and the Dean's term of office shall commence at a date to be arranged between the Bishop and the Dean."

For twenty-six years Dr. Gates has been rector of the Chapel of the Intercession, Trinity Parish, New York City. He was notified of his election by Bishop Manning Monday night and, after a meeting with the vestrymen of his church, posted a letter to the Bishop accepting the office, but expressing regret at leaving the church in which he had served as pastor for so many years. In closing, his letter said:

"To have a part under you in carrying forward the building of the Cathedral thrills me; for the plan of this Cathedral calls for the completion of what seems to me the most beautiful and magnificent of cathedrals. The spiritual value of the silent influences of such a church are too great for finite counting. I value the privilege of having a share in the erection of such a shrine."

Dr. Gates is the only clergyman in the Diocese of New York who was a member of the joint commission of the Episcopal Church for the revision of the Book of Common Prayer, recently completed. Some years ago he declined election as Bishop of Cuba. He was born in Gardner, Mass., June 29, 1866, and was graduated from Amherst College in 1886 and from the General Seminary in 1889. He was ordained a deacon in that year, and advanced to the priesthood a year later. He is married, but has no children.

Dr. Littell Accepts Election.

A cable from the Rev. Dr. Harrington Littell, of Hankow, says that he accepts his election as Bishop of Honolulu, subject to the usual confirmation.

Presiding Bishop Formally Assumes Duties.

Bishop Anderson, elected Presiding Bishop at the meeting of the House of Bishops in Washington on November 13, formally assumed the duties of his office November 26, at the Church Missions House. He attended the service in the chapel at noon, and spoke briefly at its conclusion to the assembled staff. He spent the day in consultation with the officials of the various departments of the National Council, and departed at night for Chicago, to be with his family over Thanksgiving Day. He returns to New York for the National Council meeting on December 12 and 13.

St. Luke's, Tokyo, Steadily Rising.

The huge steel framework of St. Luke's, steadily rising to the clatter of riggers and riveters, is one of the sights of Tokyo today. A most interesting feature of the construction is the fact that the building rests on a foundation of piles driven from thirty-six to eighty feet into the ground. After work had been started it was found that these piles would have to be of Douglas Fir, imported from Oregon. The additional cost doubled the original estimate for the foundation, but the American contractor is paying the difference from his own pocket, as a contribution to St. Luke's and to the welfare of the Japanese people, whom the hospital will serve. The modern steel and concrete construction of St. Luke's new building is especially interesting in Tokyo because it is as earthquake-proof as engineers can make it. Similar structures in the city withstood the last great earthquake impressively.

The fact that it has taken long and arduous effort on the part of many loyal friends to achieve the present total of approximately $1,500,000 toward the sum needed for constructing the new St. Luke's may strike some people as being hard to understand. However, those who have been most intimately associated with this task and know the manifold character of the obstacles feel greatly encouraged over the progress that has been made and are willing to "carry on" while the fund is being completed.

There are certain parts of the country, and many parts of the constituency of the Episcopal Church, which have done all and more than could be expected of them in behalf of this great project. There are other sections where, for various reasons, the appeal has not as yet been adequately presented. Moreover, there are, in all parts of the country, individual men and women with generous impulses and strong financial resources who undoubtedly would be willing to make substantial gifts if they knew intimately the story of Dr. Teusler's twenty-eight years of work at the Capital of Japan, and realized the unique opportunity which is now before him, if he is given adequate facilities for seizing it.

To this end the Rt. Rev. Charles S. Reifsnider, D. D., Suffragan Bishop of North Tokyo, has just come from Japan to join Dr. Mabel E. Elliott, Miss Christine Nuno and Mr. Paul Rusch in giving first-hand information regarding St. Luke's statesmanlike program and the urgent necessity of financing it at once, if the work is not to suffer permanently.

"No action on the part of the American people could find warmer response in the hearts of the Japanese than the building and financing of this great centre of humanitarian service," stated Bishop Reifsnider. The Japanese people want to be strong and healthy. They wish to emulate our methods of hospital and medical care, but they have to be shown how to accomplish this task.

"To hold out a way to health as a token of international friendship is the way to cement the bonds which already exist between Japan and this country in the most effective way."

There were twenty-six vacancies in the Nursing College connected with St. Luke's when the new term opened recently. No less than six hundred young women applied for admission. In accordance with the college's requirement, all of them had graduated at least from a high school. Of the twenty-six finally selected, fourteen were Christians, and twelve were not. All the non-Christians have entered the Bible classes, which have been started by the Japanese Bible women.

How truly international in character St. Luke's is and how inclusive of all races is the scope of its service is illustrated by the number of different nationalities to be found in its wards at one time. Recently, for example, one of the private wards contained two Russians, one Englishman, nine Japanese, one Spaniard, one Italian, one German, two Brazilians, four Americans, two Frenchmen, one Czechoslovakian, one Siamese and one Belgian.

Army and Navy Chaplains.

The fall meeting of the General Committee on Army and Navy Chaplains, was held in Washington on Monday, November 11. Considerable attention was given to the religious conditions in the hospitals under the Veterans' Bureau. A study of that situation throughout the country is being made jointly by the Bureau and this Committee, with the purpose of effecting such improvements as may appear to be desirable and possible.

Dr. Charles S. Macfarland, Lt. Col. Chaplains' Reserve, reported on his visitation last summer of twelve or fifteen posts and camps of the Army. Certain recommendations which he makes will be presented to the War Department in due time.

By invitation, the Chief of Chaplains of the Army was present, together with his executive officer; likewise the Chief of the Chaplains' Division of the Navy and his executive officer. Both spoke about the work being done in their respective departments and extended greetings to the Committee.

At the conclusion of the meeting the members journeyed to Arlington Cemetery where wreaths were placed upon the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier, and at the Chaplains' Cenotaph, with simple services appropriate to the occasion.

On the preceding day, Armistice Sunday was observed in a special service held under the joint auspices of the Federal Council of Churches and the General Committee on Army and Navy Chaplains at the First Congregational Church. An appropriate sermon was preached by Dr. Jason Noble Pierce, Lt. Col. Chaplains' Reserve, who is the Chairman of the General Committee. The Chief Chaplains participated in this service, as did also Dr. Macfarland and Dr. W. L. Darby, Secretary of the General Committee. An announcement of general interest was made to the effect that Hon, Alanson B. Houghton, former ambassador to Germany and to Great Britain, had accepted appointment as chairman of the Commission on International Justice and Goodwill of the Federal Council for the ensuing quadrennium, succeeding Hon. G. W. Wickersham.

The annual report of the Chief of Chaplains (Colonel Edmund P. Easterbrook), to the Secretary of War, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, included the following information:

Nine chaplains were appointed during the year and six were separated from the service, two by retirement and four by resignation. The present strength of the corps is as follows:

Colonels, 1; Lt. Colonels, 4; Majors, 11; Captains, 95; First Lieutenants, 12.

Regular Army chaplains are assigned as follows: Hawaii, 13; Philippine Department, 9; Panama Canal Department, 7; China, 1; Porto Rico, 1; Office Chief of Service, 3; Camps, Posts and Stations in the United States, 64; Disciplinary Barracks, 2; Special Service Schools—staff and faculty, 2; Students—special course, U. S.—1.

The various denominations are represented in the chaplaincy as follows:

Baptist, North, 8; Baptist, South, 5; Baptist, Colored, 2; Congregational, 8; Disciples of Christ, 7; Evangelical, 1; Lutheran, 8; Methodist Episcopal, 17; Methodist Episcopal, South, 8; Methodist, Protestant, 1; Methodist Episcopal, African, 1; Presbyterian, U. S., 2; Presbyterian, U. S. A., 10; Presbyterian, Cumberland, 1; Protestant Episcopal, 9; Reformed in America, 1; Reformed in U. S., 1; Roman Catholic, 39; Unitarian, 2; Universalist, 2.

But one of Monday's speakers, a "Friend of Soviet Russia," by the way, said that the Church must rebel against capitalism, imperialism and militarism, or perish. Well—the writer is, alas, no capitalist, nor yet imperialist, or militarist, but a glad partisan of the Kellogg Treaties, world disarmament and the World Court. He ventures to assert that his convictions of the social justice, the inestimable social value, especially to the working classes, of capitalism, individual right and liberty to work, individual reward proportioned to achievement, and individual freedom from collective tyranny in Government, are quite as sincere and unselfish as the diametrically opposed convictions of those speakers. Humbly following George Washington, a devout member of the Church, he sees nothing impossible in entire Christian loyalty both to church and country. He thinks there is such a thing as a righteous war; and he vainly tried as a boy to serve in the Civil War, and as an old man in the World War. He backs these convictions in business, industry and politics; but not in his church, supported as it is for utterly different purpose, and no doubt by not a few of utterly different convictions. He conceives that he has no moral or legal right to pervert the contributions of others to ends which they abhor.

Furthermore, he questions the wisdom of those who, for principle, taking "no thought for the morrow", would put the church into politics; a question likewise perplexing other churches just now. The Constitution and traditions of our country, because of the ghastly record of religious intolerance throughout the ages, have from the first divorced church and state. The writer profoundly believes in that divorce, and vigorously opposes any attack upon it by his own church, or any other. Quite apart from any legal risk involved, political antagonism would as inevitably rend the church into fiercely hostile factions as did ever religious passion.

Moreover, the clergy certainly have vast enough problems of their own, in solving their own errors concerning the eternal mysteries of life, death, the hereafter, good, evil, the nature and relations of God and man, without casually undertaking to remedy the mistakes and injustices of the Almighty, in creating men and races that differ one from another, in nature, power, environment and consequent prosperity—by just turning the world and the fullness thereof over to a fantastic international power—say Soviet Russia, as the only one in sight—whose justification for receiving that colossal trust, in the eyes of the reverend pacifists of Monday last, could only be its record, of murder and robbery of two million Russian citizens, of maintenance of the largest army on earth, and last, perhaps not least, of attempt to abolish God.

Meantime, there is nothing unusual in the present incident. At the General Convention of 1913, the friends of Socialism slipped through a vague social service resolution, which the Church League for Industrial Democracy since cites as its own charter for Socialist activity; though its proposer, who was not its author, later disclaimed all knowledge of such intent. Again, at the last General Convention at Washington, a resolution against political activity in the Church was neatly tabled by the same clever tacticians, on the argument that the opening sermon of the presiding bishop, against such activity, accepted by all as the dictum of the Church, had rendered a resolution unnecessary. But the activities continue; witness Monday last.

In view, therefore, of that incident, and the public interest in it already noted, the writer, a modest contributor through his parish to the Diocesan Fund, would with the utmost respect inquire in this public way, as he believes he has moral and legal right to do, concerning the future; earnestly urging the Dean and Chapter, for the information of their constituents, to stand up and be counted for or against use of the means and authority of the diocese for political or industrial agitation.

COLLECT FOR SECOND SUNDAY IN ADVENT.

Blessed Lord, Who hast caused all holy Scriptures to be written for our learning, grant that we may in such wise hear them read, mark, learn and inwardly digest them, that by patience and comfort and Thy Holy Word, we may embrace, and ever hold fast, the blessed hope of everlasting life which Thou hast given us in Our Saviour Jesus Christ. Amen.

A HYMN OF UNITY.

We come, we come, we come
O'er mountain, plain and sea,
Whose feet have trod the ways of God,
We come to Thee,
With one accord
To sing one faith for life and death,
One hope, one Lord.

But not alone we come,
The valiant ones we boast,
The saints who pray for us today,
A glorious host;
With one accord
We cry with these from bended knees
To Thee our Lord.

From clamorous strife we come,
From fearing rivalries,
To sue Thy grace for all our ways,
Thy healing peace;
With one accord
From many lands we raise our hands
To Thee our Lord.

One brotherhood we come,
Our glory in one Name,
One cross our sign, one love divine
Our hearts to inflame;
With one accord
We sing one faith in life and death,
One hope, one Lord.

Christ and Life's Crises.

Crises are as common in life as storms on a Galilean lake. We are always standing at the parting of the ways. Every important choice we make is a strategic occasion. The strong temptation, the keen disappointment, the overwhelming misfortune, the sudden danger, the bitter sorrow—all present common and critical situations. It is all a part of life as every one knows. It is out of the sum total of such experiences the warp and woof of life is made. Our great need is for right spiritual adjustments to these experiences in order that the pattern of our life may be an attractive and beautiful outline. The whole of life is important, but special significance attaches to peculiar situations and experiences.

The near tragedy of the Galilean Sea which Scripture relates brought Christ from His seclusion and retirement. He went from them when they wanted to make Him king. But it is different now. His disciples are in serious straits. The water is turbulent, the winds boisterous. They had left the shore at sunset. It was now the very early hours of the morning. They had gone possibly two or three miles. They were in great danger. In the crisis Christ comes. Their distress is the magnet that draws. He needs rest it is true, but the safety of His disciples concerned Him most of all.

Christ has not changed. Life still is a dangerous adventure. We are being constantly confronted with anxious and distressing experiences. It is true that much of the hardness of life arises out of circumstances over which we have no control. Then again, it may result from our own folly and sin. Unhappiness comes from wrong ways of living. In any case our need is great and they that are whole need not a physician but they that are sick. Christ, we read, "went into a house and would have no man know it, but He could not be hid". Why not? Because there was misery and need outside and He must be there to help. This is the spirit of the Christ. Let us remember then for our comfort that whatever our emergent needs—and how varied and great they are!—Christ comes to heal, to help, and to save.

The story tells us that it was the fourth watch of the night when He came to the storm-tossed disciples. That is, the last watch. That would be the darkness just before the dawn. They had been struggling all through the night and things did not get any better, but rather worse. They were at their wits' end. The extremity of their case was great. And, of course, we remember that well known proverb that man's extremity is God's opportunity. And so it was when hope was all but spent, Christ comes. How leisurely God moves over the page of history. With Him there is no hurrying and no delaying. His time is the right time or spiritual standard time, if you will. Jesus did not return to the home of sorrow at Bethany until two days after the pathetic appeal was made to Him and after Lazarus had died. Peter lay in prison till the last hour of the last watch and then He put on one article of clothing after another before the prison gates opened.

So in the crisis, we, too, no doubt have felt our deliverance is delayed. We thought the time long overdue. In our haste, we said God has forgotten or He does not care! Oh, how foolish and slow of heart we are to believe. Let us possess our soul in patience. Let hope discipline our impatience. Let us believe, in spite of appearances that He will come in His own good time, which is, after all, the best time, with help which is adequate and satisfying. "Wait on the Lord; be of good courage and he shall strengthen thine heart; wait, I say, on the Lord."

In the end Christ came dramatically—walking on the sea. No good purpose is served by stopping to enquire how He did this. It is enough for our purpose to know He came to the distressed disciples in an unexpected fashion. He surprised them. So great was their surprise, they were actually terrified. But that was like Him to do the surprising thing. There was nothing conventional about Him. He did not follow along in the rut others had made. The increasing interest of Christ is His newness. They were terrified because they thought they saw an apparition. People are always afraid when they misinterpret the truth. It is because people do not know Christ that they are afraid of him.

We can anticipate the coming of Christ in our crisis, but we cannot anticipate the fashion in which He will come. It will not be in a mechanical or stereotyped way. The wind bloweth where it listeth and thou canst not tell whence it cometh or whither it goeth." So it is with the Spirit of God. He may come in the glow of the sunset, the fall of a leaf, the rising of an emotion, the falling of a tear.

But His coming will be in power—in the power of love. The stormy sea is recognized in the Old Testament as an emblem of antagonism to divine rule. Jesus masters the antagonisms of life. He causes the wealth of man to praise Him. He is Master of all the forces of life.

His first coming, in the fullness of time, in the world's greatest crisis, was as a child—in weakness and utter dependency, But it was the weakness of God and the weakness of God is stronger than man. There was a spiritual potency in that apparent weakness which effected the world's redemption.

The time comes—it may be once, it may be often—when the bottom seems to be falling out of things, when life seems futile, when our feet slip and everything seems to go wrong. In that hour let us remember that in the crisis Christ comes. That is enough. He can meet any situation. He can help, He can save, He can set our feet upon the rock and establish our going. One has written, "Again and again I have been tempted to give up the struggle, but always the figure of that strange man hanging on the cross sends me back to my task again." And so it is ever in the experiences of men—

"His coming like the morn shall be Like morning songs His voice."

—Dr. Alex. Kerr, in Presbyterian Banner.

God's Agency.

I do not see how God's work could be done without enthusiasm. A church savors very little of life when its work is done only in a half-hearted and indifferent way by its members. . . . . Let us make up our minds to use our church as a means through which we can come to God and He to us. Let us think of it not as a mere company of individuals, a few of whom we like, more or whom we do not, some of whom we know, and still more of whom are utter strangers, whose life and love are a matter of indifference to us. Let us rather realize and feel ever more and more that the Church is God's agency for righteousness, and that all of these people are allied agents in promoting His Kingdom.—Rev. Malcolm W. Lockhart.

Every Man's Duty to Propagate His Religion.

Any man who has a religion is bound to do one of two things with it, change it or spread it. If it isn't true, he must give it up. If it is true, he must give it away.

This is not the duty of ministers only. Religion is not an affair of a profession or of a caste. It is the business of every common man.

Where did I come from? What am I here for? Whither am I going? These are questions which confront every man. They are no more real to a minister than they are to a merchant or a marine. Every man must answer them for himself. And the answer that he gives them determines his religion. There is no proxy religion. Each man has his own. If he hasn't he has none. No other man can have it for him. And if he has his own, then he must propagate it, if it is true, or repudiate it, if it is false.

The command to evangelize the world was not given by our Lord to apostles only, or to those whom the apostles might centuries later be claimed to have commissioned for such work. It was given to all believers, "Every disciple was to be a discipler," as Dr. Gordon used to say. Whosoever heard the good news was to pass it on to the next man, and he to the next.

The idea that the world or any one land is to be evangelized by one section of the Christian body, the other sections being exempt from all duty of propagation of the faith, is preposterous for many reasons; chiefly because a faith that does not make every possessor eager to propagate it is not worth propagating, and will not be received by any people to whom it is offered. The religion that would spread among men must be offered by man to man, and its power seen in dominating the lives of all its adherents and making them eager for its dissemination. No propagation of a profession, essential as a distinct teaching and leading class may be, will ever accomplish what can be accomplished by a great mass of common men, who preach Christ where they stand in home, office, road or shop.

"In the list of Indian missionaries of Mohammedanism, published in the journal of a religious and philanthropic society of Lahore," says Arnold in "The Preaching of Islam", we find the names of schoolmasters, government clerks in the Canal and Opium Departments, traders, including a dealer in camel carts, an editor of a newspaper, a bookbinder, and a workman in a printing establishment. These men devote the hours of leisure left them after the completion of the day's labor to the preaching of their religion in the streets and bazaars of Indian cities, seeking to win converts from among Christians and Hindus, whose religious belief they controvert and attack."

This is what constitutes the power of Islam. With no missionary organization, with no missionary order, the religion yet spread over Western Asia and Northern Africa, and retains still its foothold on the soil of Europe. Where the common man believes his religion and spreads it, other men believe it, too.

The minister is to be simply colonel of the regiment. The real fighting is to be done by the men in the ranks, who carry the guns. No ideal could be more non-Christian or more irrational than that the religious colonel is engaged to do fighting for his men, while they sit at ease. And yet, perhaps, there is one idea current which is more absurd still. That is that there is to be no fighting at all, but that the colonel is paid to spend his time solacing his regiment, or giving it gentle, educative instruction, not destined ever to result in any downright manly effort on the part of the whole regiment to do anything against the enemy.

Laymen are bound to propagate their religion by speaking about it, by preaching it, in fact. When one man meets another in a railroad train and speaks of Christ to him, it is as legitimate a type of preaching as the delivery of a set discourse by another man from a pulpit in a church. Telling men the gospel, explaining what Christ can be to a man, is preaching, as Scriptural as any preaching can be made. It makes no difference if it is done haltingly. A broken testimony from a laborer to his friend is likely to be more effective than a smooth and conclusive Sunday morning sermon.—Robert E. Speer.

I LIKE TO FEEL.

Florence Van Fleet Lyman.

I like to feel when I lie down
For hush of sleep at night,
That no heartaches because of me
And I have lived aright.

From dawn until the time of rest
In all I say and do,
This makes a perfect day for me
Heart sweet, beloved true.

These living hours are silvered through
With joy and peace always,
But memory of them purest gold
When comes the after days.

Sin.

For many years during latter part of last century the church was severely criticised for its low estimate of man's worth. Sin was over-emphasized. Man was lord of creation, and forgiveness and repentance were not for such as he. Now listen to what science says. Professor Schiller of Oxford University, described as one of the best critical minds of our age, says, "Humanity is still yahoomanity. Alike in neutrality and morality, man is still substantially identical with his palaeolithic ancestors. He is still the irrational, emotional, foolish, destructive, credulous creature that he always was." John Calvin could not have said more. A prominent author quotes a Viennese friend who said to him last spring: "I believe in only one thing, and that is, in the wickedness of men." There is work for the Church of Christ. She has the only solution—the regeneration of the inner-man through the indwelling power of God's Holy Spirit. Let it be preached.—Exchange.

THE PRESENCE.

Martha S. Gielow.

Like a rainbow in the night
Comes a gleaming soft and bright
Lightning darkness, spanning fear
With the promise, "I am here"—
And the fear and darkness vanish,
For Protecting-Love is near.

When We Give Up.

No matter what the circumstance, when a Christian gives up to despair and despondency he is sinning against God's clear revelation of his love and care. And he is doing just what Satan wants him to do. When the Lord Jesus was tempted in the wilderness, the great aim of the Evil One was to have Christ mistrust His Father's love. But each time the Lord stood firm on "It is written", refusing to doubt His Father's Word. How different was the response of the Jews, suffering under the yoke of their oppressors. They bemoaned their fate and said that their way was "hid from the Lord", and that their case was too difficult for His remedy (Isa. 40:27). Then God through His prophet spoke these challenging words. "Hast thou not known? hast thou not heard, that the everlasting God, the Lord, the Creator of the ends of the earth, fainteth not, neither is weary? there is no searching of His understanding. He giveth power to the faint; and to them that have no might he increaseth strength" (Isa. 40:28, 29). All through their national existence God had been doing marvelous things for them, delivering them from destruction time and again. The "law and the prophets" were filled with instances of God's working in behalf of His people. They had been commanded to remember His mighty acts, and meditation upon them might have saved captive Israel many hours of needless despair. But how much more complete is the written Word that God has preserved for us, telling of His tender concern for those who belong to Him. It behooves us then to hide His Word in our hearts, so that when difficult times come, and with them the temptation to think God has forgotten us, we may reply confidently, "It is written", and turn from despair to thanksgiving for God's goodness and mercy which endure forever.—Sunday-School Times.

In the Cross of Christ We Glory.

It was not an accident or blind fate that fell upon Jesus and crushed Him on the cross, but this was the deep outworking of the purpose and will of God. Therefore it shall not fail of its purpose, but shall result in length of days. He shall see the travail of His soul and shall justify many and he shall be assigned a portion with the great and divide the spoil with the strong. Is not this all being fulfilled in ways and measures beyond the utmost vision of the prophet? Christ dropped as a seed into the soil of the hard Roman world to perish, but he sprang up in a harvest that rapidly spread around the Mediterranean shore and has now blown its seed around the world. Who among the mighty today can compare in human loftiness of character and massiveness of attainment with Jesus Christ? To name any military leader at once makes apparent the absurdity of the comparison, and will any literary character or scientific investigator or philosophic thinker enter the competition? Any and every one of these eminent men would instantly disavow any comparison. As Charles Lamb once said to a company of literary men, "If Shakespeare were to enter into this presence we would all rise, but if Jesus Christ were to enter we would all kneel". Jesus is even now reigning with a depth and sweep of power no sword or pen or human wisdom or greatness could ever attain and He will yet be crowned Lord of all.

BOOK THOUGHTS.

I sometimes stop to think about
My books upon the shelves.
I wonder if they whisper things
And talk among themselves.

But I suppose they never talk;
They'd rather be a part
Of things I think and dream about
Deep in my mind and heart.

My books are just like friendly friends,
No two are just the same.
I love them for their different ways,
And know each one by name.

One friend takes me to foreign lands;
Another shows me kings;
While still another teaches me
Of places, men, and things.

Some show me how to use my hands
In many, many ways.
And others take me racing back
To strange and ancient days.

Yes, all my books and friends indeed:
With them I always find
A kindly welcome and the best
Of food for heart and mind.

SECRET-TIME.

Now's the jolliest time of year,
All the children know:
Merry secret-time is here;
See us on tiptoe!

Father comes with parcels brown;
Mother grabs them quick;
Brother brings a load from town,
Wrapped in paper thick.

Sister hides in tissue white
All her secrets gay;
Tied with holly ribbon bright,
Soon they're sent away.

Whispering secrets—oh, what fun!
Makes us giggle so!
"Sh! Just take a peep—and run!
Mother mustn't know."

Secrets up-stairs, down-stairs, too,
Hidden all away;
Won't there be a great to-do,
When it's Christmas Day!

"And He Healed Them."

(We are glad to further the publicity of this little story, and to remind the children of the Southern Churchman family that their birthday offerings will go to help build the Children's Ward of St. Luke's Hospital, Tokyo.—Editor "For the Young Folks.")

Little Miss Dancing-Feet sat on the step of her home. She might better have been called Miss Too-Tired-to-Dance, for all day she had carried her baby brother on her back. He was a big baby, and old enough to walk, but something seemed to be wrong with his legs. Dancing-Feet was often too tired to play with the other children who lived in the same street, but today her back was aching even more than usual. That morning her mother had gone down to the foreign quarter of the city, and one of the great monsters called automobiles had hurt her. Some one had taken her away to St. Luke's Hospital and she would not come home for many days. Dancing-Feet was frightened at the thought of the hospital, for she had heard that strange, foreign men performed horrible tortures on people there.

Now she was waiting for her big brother, Thankful-Gift, to come home from the silk-mill so that they could go together to find their mother at the hospital. She hoped that Thankful-Gift would be able to walk to the foreign quarter with her, for she was dreadfully afraid to go alone, but often after his day's work he could only lie on a mat and cough.

At last he came, dragging his feet as if he was almost too tired to move; but when he heard the news of their mother he would rest for only a moment. Then he took Dancing-Feet's hand and started bravely on again. By the time they reached the hospital Thankful-Gift was coughing hard and poor Dancing-Feet's back was bent nearly double from carrying the baby and trying to help her brother.

To their surprise it was not a "foreign devil" who met them, but a smiling little Japanese lady in a shining white dress. She said her name was O-Hina-San, and as soon as she saw Thankful-Gift she pushed forward a chair. Quickly she lifted the baby from Dancing-Feet's shoulders.

After waiting a few minutes they were led into a long, bright room, with dozens of beds as clean and white as O-Hina-San's dress. There, in one of the beds, was Mother, smiling happily at the sight of her children. Only a bandage about her head showed that anything had happened to her. When the foreign doctor stopped at Mother's bed, Dancing-Feet forgot to be afraid, and let him feel of her little bent shoulders without a whimper. Then Thankful-Gift coughed, and the doctor turned to look at him. O-Hina-San called his attention to the baby's legs, too.

For many days after that the little family stayed at the hospital. The doctors were making a little harness for Dancing-Feet's back, and she was learning to love them and the nurses and the clean, white beds and the airy, sunshiny wards.

At last the doctor said that Dancing-Feet and her mother and the baby could go home. Mother was quite well again and was trying hard to keep all the rules the doctor had made about preparing new kinds of food and opening the shutters at night. Out in the street with the other children, Dancing-Feet could play as hard and run as fast as any of them. Dancing-Feet and her mother had thought that the baby might never be able to walk, but now he was beginning to pull himself up on his little fat feet and to smile and kick happily instead of crying most of the time.

Soon Thankful-Gift will be coming home—when the doctors have cured his cough entirely. Every week a nurse comes to Dancing-Feet's house to look at the baby's legs and help Mother with the strange foods. Sometimes she takes Dancing-Feet with her to the hospital to see Thankful-Gift and to let the clinic doctor tighten the little harness on her back.

At first Dancing-Feet wondered why the doctors and nurses were so kind to her and her family, but now she is beginning to understand about the Lord Jesus. When she first heard about the Christian religion it sounded very strange, but now she sees the doctors and nurses at St. Luke's doing the sort of things that Jesus did, and it helps her to feel that He really cares for her and for all children who are sick and unhappy.—Elsie C. Farrel.

Billy's Reward.

Billy swung into the house, red of face and hot, and pitched his cap on the hall table.

"Mama!" he shouted.

"Here I am," came the answer, and Billy strode into the dining room. Mrs. Wynne was arranging a vase of flowers for the supper table.

"Guess what!" he exclaimed.

"What?" she asked quickly, pausing to look at him.

Billy wiped the perspiration from his face.

"Mrs. Latimer says she'll give five dollars reward to anybody that finds Spot, and brings him home."

"Well!" his mother exclaimed.

"He's been gone two days now and she's been afraid he won't come back."

Billy sat on the edge of a chair, too tired to stand.

"I wonder where he could be," said Mrs. Wynne, gently adjusting the flowers.

"I know," declared Billy.

"Where?"

"Out in the woods. Because one day I was out in the woods and I saw him."

"Yes, but that was some time ago."

"Well, but you see, that shows where he goes."

Mrs. Wynne smoothed out a wrinkle in the tablecloth.

"Maybe so," she said, "but it seems to me he would be back home by now if that's where he went."

"Pete and I are going after him tomorrow," Billy announced.

"All right," agreed Mrs. Wynne, smiling at him. "Now, go and get ready for supper."

The next day after school, Billy and Pete hurried home and left their books and got some apples and cookies and started for the woods.

"If we find Spot and get the reward," Billy said, "I'll get the most, 'cause I was the first one to say about going in the woods."

"No, sir!" argued Pete. "If I see him first, I'll get the most, 'cause I'll be the one that found him."

"Good day, no!" Billy contended. "That won't be fair, 'cause if it wasn't for me we wouldn't be going after him."

"Yes," admitted Pete, "but if it wasn't for me, maybe we wouldn't find him at all."

"Maybe we won't."

"But maybe we will."

This was a stumper, and they strode along in silence.

"I tell you?" Billy exclaimed presently. "I'll take three dollars and give you two."

"No," Pete countered, "I'll take three and give you two."

They strode on again in silence.

"Well," said Billy at length, "I guess I'll take half and give you half."

"Well," agreed Pete.

They grinned at each other.

"Man deenum!" Billy exclaimed, snapping his fingers. "I hope we get it!"

"Yes, boy!" shouted Pete.

By and by they reached the woods, a place of tall trees and open spaces and tangled undergrowth, of birds and fresh green leaves, where violets grew and the air was sweet with the fragrance of wild honey-suckle.

"Where did you see him that time?" asked Pete.

"I think it was down this way," Billy answered, pointing and taking the lead.

"Here Spot, here!" Pete called out, and echoes came back from the ridge beyond.

Billy put two fingers in his mouth and whistled, and the shrill sound went far into the woods and was lost. On and on they walked, munching cookies and apples as they went, and stopping now and then to watch a scampering ground squirrel or to listen at the song of a bird. At the foot of the slope they came to a small stream, winding its way through the woods, sparkling and gurgling over white pebbles and green rocks and gleaming in quiet pools.

"Uh!" grunted Billy, "I wish it was summer time, so we would get in and splash."

"Gee!" exclaimed Pete. "So do I."

He stooped and held his hand in the cool, rippling water. Billy pitched in a small twig and it floated down and hung on a projecting rock.

They followed the stream through the woods to where it broadened out beside a sand bar, and here they stopped a while and skipped rocks over the silvery surface of the water. At length they reached the edge of the woods not far from an old mill, which looked neglected and dismal, even in the golden light of sunset.

"Here, Spot, here!" shouted Pete.

"I don't believe we're going to find him," said Billy.

For answer Pete gave a shrill whistle and another and another, but there was no sign of Spot. Then they set out again, crossing the road, and took short cuts over fields and hills to town. Twilight was coming on when they reached Pete's house, Pete climbed up on the fence.

"Maybe we can find him tomorrow," he said.

"Maybe so," agreed Billy. "Good-bye."

"Good-bye."

Billy went on down the street and turned into another street that led up past Mrs. Latimer's cottage to his own home. When he had almost reached the cottage he stopped in amazement. Before his very eyes Spot trotted across the street and went through the gate!

"Here, Spot, here!" he cried.

Spot turned and ran out to meet him and jumped up to lick his hand.

"Nice old dog," said Billy, patting him on the head.

Then he glanced toward the cottage. The reward! He could claim the reward! Five dollars! His heart thumped. Would it be right? He held Spot by the collar. But the dog pulled so hard that Billy had to go with him, and together they went between the box-woods to the cottage door. Billy knocked, and Spot scratched with his paws. Mrs. Latimer opened the door.

"Well, Spot!" she exclaimed.

Spot gave a yelp of delight and jumped up and down and licked his mistress' hand, and the little old lady was so happy she almost hugged him.

"Where in the world have you been?" she cried.

For answer Spot raced around a moment or two and then sat down before her and held out his paw, and she shook hands with him and laughed.

"Oh, I'm so glad you found him!" she exclaimed, turning to Billy, who looked confused and excited, but tried to smile.

"I am, too," he said lamely.

"Now," she announced, "I have something for you."

She went quickly out of the room and presently returned with a crisp five dollar bill in her hand.

"Here is your reward," she said. "It's five dollars; so be careful and don't lose it."

Billy took it and mumbled a word of thanks and looked down at the floor. She smiled at him.

"What are you going to do with it?" she asked.

"— I don't know," he answered.

Just then Spot and the cat fell out, and the cat scratched him on the nose, and he jumped for it, and it scampered under the sofa, and Spot stuck his head under and got another scratch on the nose. He jumped back with a yelp.

"Poor old Spot!" cried Mrs. Latimer, patting him on the head.

This was Billy's chance to escape.

"Good-bye," he mumbled, and vanished through the door.

He held the coveted five dollars tight in his hand as he hurried toward home. He felt bewildered at the swift happenings of the past few minutes, and peered at the money in his hand to make sure he really had it. The twilight deepened, and beyond the top of his house he caught sight of an evening star, soft and radiant and very peaceful. As he looked at it he halted, and for several moments he stood like a statue. Then, still looking at the star, he spoke aloud.

"No," he said, "it isn't right. I'm going back.

Resolutely he turned about and retraced his steps to the cottage. He walked lightly and held himself erect. It seemed as if a burden had fallen from his shoulders. He knocked on the door, and present it opened.

"Why, Billy!" exclaimed the old lady. "What's the matter?"

Billy held out the five dollars.

"I—I didn't find Spot," he said, "He just came home himself."

She reached out slowly and took the money.

"But I don't understand," she protested.

Billy looked up into her eyes. It was a look that told more than words. His lips quivered.

"Good-bye," he said quickly, and ran home as fast as he could go.

He did not have the five dollars, but in his heart was the greater reward of knowing he was honest, and he was glad. —J. C. J., in Southwestern Episcopalian.

Bucking Up.

Betty Ann turned her little frail body over as far as she dared and gave her pillows a shaking. This she had done at least a dozen times that day. And it was only one o'clock. They would get another dozen before the day was ended.

For Betty Ann all days had been very much alike—until a few minutes before. Just days—days growing into months—then years. It had been seven years. She was twelve now. Yes, for seven years she had been a cripple. But what of that? Others had been even longer. And so she thought of it, taking everything as a matter of course.

But now, just a few minutes ago, everything had changed. Here she lay thinking of things she had never thought of before. She had overheard her mother and one of her friends talking. They were talking about her. And then came the words that had brought about this sudden change.

"Sylvia, I'm sorry for Betty Ann. She's getting so thin and pale. It might have been best if—" The sentence was not finished. Betty Ann thought she heard sniffs. But these words! She remembered them. And then her mother's words.

"Yes, Mary, but we must never let her know. We must go on trying to cheer her up."

That was all. But she had heard it. Now she was thinking—building new foot holds on which to climb.

"They must not be sorry for me," she whispered over and over again. She knew she must stay in bed but she didn't want folks to feel sorry for her—to pity her. No, she could never stand that. For these seven years her family and friends had been doing all kinds of things for her comfort and all the time they had been feeling sorry for her. Why had she not thought of that? But she had not. She now felt that she had accepted everything and given nothing.

"I'm going to make them sorry they have been sorry for me. They are going to feel that they have gone to unnecessary trouble." Betty Ann almost shouted these words to the four walls about her. She was going to begin right then. After all she had lots to live for. From her own big window she could see the setting sun—the moon as it climbed on its way—trees and flowers. The birds sang to her. Books and pictures were piled on her table. The most tempting trays were brought right to her bedside. Every wish was granted. Why, God had made everything just for her! And she had failed to do her part. But now new thoughts and feelings were being born. Right there in her own little bed she was going to put her shoulder to the wheel. Her room was to be a place where others would go to catch a bit of cheer and sunshine. She was going to make it so. Nothing would keep her from it.

And Betty Ann did. She made all feel that they were missing something —that right there in that little room you could see and feel things that you could not elsewhere. Of course God is everywhere but they felt that most of Him was right there.

Betty Ann knew her strength was limited, but she also knew there was no limit to love and good cheer. She was smiling all the time and her smiles were getting to be contagious. Every body smiled. Aside from being cheerful she was actually doing things for her loved ones. There were lots of things she could do. Her mother didn't have to stop her work now to do a bit of basting, hemming or darning. Too, she was making pictures for children who were less fortunate than she. There was nothing wrong with her hands and she kept them busy. And story telling had become one of her favorite hobbies. Sometimes her room was crowded with children. She had something to tell the grown ups too—about the things she was going to do when she got on her feet again.

"I'm just resting up for the days ahead," she would often say.

Then a day came when she overheard whispered voices again.

"Sylvia I think she's wonderful. I believe she gets more out of life than you or I do. That child is going to get up some day. Now, watch my word."

Her mother said something, but Betty Ann didn't hear it. The happy thumping in her heart was too loud.—Southern Christian Advocate.

I SEE THEE.

Maude Forrest Mumma.

I see Thee in the sunlight's gleam,
I see Thee in the moonlight's beam;
I see Thee in the red, red rose,
I see Thee in every flower that grows.

I see Thee in the ocean's crest,
I see Thee in the Babe at rest:
I see Thee in the tree-tops tall,
I see Thee in the sparrow's fall.

I see Thee in every walk of life,
I see Thee in the toil and strife;
I see Thee in the work we do,
I see Thee in the pleasures, too.

Wherever I go I seem to see,
Things that foretell of Heaven and Thee.

Buying Cherries.

"You think a lot of yourself," said Ethel sourly. "But that little Lena Carson is always ahead of you in class, I notice."

That was the way Ethel talked. It was her brother this time. But whoever she talked to she was sure to say something bitter and uncomfortable before she got through.

Ethel had bad headaches. They made her cross. She ate too much candy, and she knew it. But she had never roused up her will to stop. Ethel had a strong will, but she gave it very little use.

Jack, Ethel's brother, seldom talked back. But this time he did.

"Lena Carson is a good scout," he said meaningly. "She isn't sour and fussy. When a girl gets sour, she's a dead loss!"

Ethel flushed. It is one thing to say sharp things to other people, and quite another to hear them about oneself.

As she went off to school Jack's remarks rankled.

What made it worse was that she saw a flaring sign at the fruit stand on the corner.

"Sour cherries—two pounds for ,wenty cents.

"Sweet cherries—forty cents a pound."

Sourness evidently was a dead loss in the fruit trade. Ethel suddenly saw herself as becoming valueless and undesirable. She had never thought about that side of it. Now she remembered, with a pang, that she had not been elected to any of the class committees lately. She had said bitterly afterward that the class did not do anything worth doing, and had felt that she made things even by saying so. But suppose the other girls thought she was not worth having? In that case she could not feel superior any more. She would feel inferior instead.

All day long Ethel fought the resemblance of that cherry sign. But she could not get away from it. As she went home from school she passed the candy store where she usually bought a box of candy for home consumption. She did not stop there. She looked the other way. Her will was beginning to rouse itself.

Next day she dressed herself with a definite resolve in her mind: "I will be pleasant in what I say and do." The result was that she did not do or say much. She kept back the sour remarks, however, that felt like making. That was a step taken.

In about a week things were slowly different. Jack whistled to himself, as he noticed it. He really did love his sister, so did not tease her about the new departure. "She's a good kid," he said to himself. "She can be as nice as anybody when she tries."

Trying—that was it. Ethel never had tried so hard. A bad habit is always stronger than the owner dreams. Ethel has gone on finding that out ever since. But she has gone on conquering it, too. She has let the sour cherry class behind, and her personality is gaining in value fast. She will be at the top price yet. Ethel is that kind of a girl.—Girls' World.

God's Conundrum.

Faith as revealed to us in Scripture is of a twofold nature; there is the faith that asks and the faith that accepts; the faith that appeals and the faith that appropriates. This is probably the reason why prayer and thanksgiving are so often associated in the writings of St. Paul. They represent us the two aspects of faith. Prayer is the faith that asks: thanksgiving is the faith that takes. We lose a good deal in our Christian life by failure to dis-

"A wise man built his house upon a rock--- and the rains descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew and it fell not; for it was founded upon a rock."

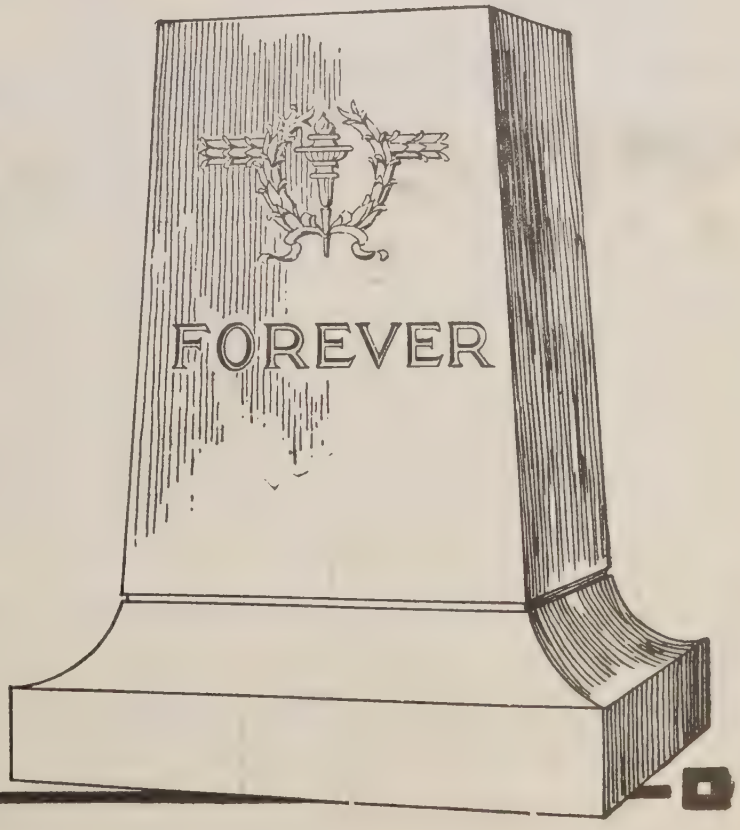
Like rock house foundations, the essential quality of rock for monuments is durability. Other important qualities are beauty, legibility of inscriptions and adaptability to design. Granite is the only stone that fills these requirements, and many granites do not possess all these qualities.

Winnsboro Granite

"The Silk of the Trade"

is a true granite, as pure a granite as is known. It possesses all of the above essential qualities for the ideal memorial, and it contains less deleterious ingredients—iron, lime, water—than other granites It is, therefore, the most durable.



Be sure that "Winnsboro Granite" is specified in your contract for monuments. Like other high quality materials, there are many inferior substitutes, which resemble this granite on first appearance, but do not possess its lasting qualities and permanent beauty.

Have your monument dealer furnish you with a personal guarantee from the quarries that the monument your purchase is cut in genuine Winnsboro Granite.

The certificate of the quarries is signed by B. H. Heyward, Treas., and General Manager, whose signature insures genuine Winnsboro Granite. A facsimile of this signature is reproduced below.

Deaths

MRS. JOHN JONES.

On November 10th, after a long illness at her home, at Braddock Heights, Maryland, MRS. MARY HAYS JONES, widow of John Jones, passed to the life eternal, aged eighty years. She was beloved by young and old and took a keen interest in current events and in past history, her wonderful memory recalling dates and incidents with an ease which was inspiring.

She was a loyal friend and devoted mother. She leaves six children who cherish her memory.

In her early womanhood she ratified her baptismal vows in the rite of confirmation and proved by her study of the Scriptures, the Articles of Religion as established by the Protestant Episcopal Church.

The church services at Barnesville, Md., her native town, were begun in her home and she gave the land on which the church was built, as long as it should be used for that purpose.

She was an ardent Southerner, being for many years Historian of E. V. White Chapter, U. D. C., and chaplain for life of the Maryland Division, U. D. C.

Her earthly remains lie beside her beloved husband, in Monocasy Cemetery, Beallsville, Md., there to await the resurrection morn.

"When grown weary with care and strife,
Our loved ones find in sleep the peace they crave,
We should not weep, but learn to count this life
A prelude to the one beyond the grave.
And thus be happy for them, not distressed,
But learn to lift our hearts with love to God and smile,
And we anon like tired ones will rest
If we will hope and wait a little while."

Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., Bishop

Special preachers are delivering the addresses at the Sunday evening services during Advent at Trinity Church, and the first of these addresses was made by Canon Anson Phelps Stokes of Washington Cathedral.

Ministers who are new to the District of Columbia during the past year will be guests of the Y. M. C. A. at a complimentary luncheon on Friday, December 6, at 12:30, at the new Y. W. C. A. Building, at Seventeenth and K Streets. Page McK. Etchison, director of religious work of the Y. M. C. A., is in charge of the arrangements.

Rt. Rev. E. T. Helfenstein, D. D., Bishop.

Roberts-Lauster.

Bishop Helfenstein, assisted by the Rev. James A. Mitchell, solemnized the marriage of the Rev. William Christian Roberts and Miss Ruth E. Lauster, on Saturday, November 16, in the Church of the Messiah, Hamilton, Baltimore, Md. The couple left immediately after the ceremony for a trip North.

Miss Lauster was a trained nurse and connected with the Visiting Nurses' Association of Baltimore.

Mr. Roberts is a graduate of Johns Hopkins University and the Virginia Theological Seminary. He is now rector of St. James' Parish, Monkton, and he and his bride will live in the rectory at Monkton, Maryland.

They were both communicants of the Church of the Messiah.

St. George's Church, Dundalk.

Bishop Helfenstein visited the new church in Dundalk—St. George's—on Thanksgiving Day and dedicated it. He confirmed a special class of six persons and also dedicated two beautiful brass vases and the altar cross to the Glory of God and in lovely memory of his daughter, Grace Nelson Helfenstein.

St. George's Church was built in the early spring and their first service was held on Easter Day.

The work was begun about twenty-five years ago and was then centered in a small frame Chapel in St. Helena, which is now a part of Dundalk. After the World War, this community grew when several new industrial plants were built near Sparrow's Point. The Bethlehem Steel Company enlarged their plant, the Baltimore Air Port established itself and, with other manufacturing plants, Dundalk became quite an important little place.

The ground was given by the Bethlehem Steel Company in the heart of the town for the erection of the church. The Bishops found a way for its construction, the plans were drawn by Mottu and White and executed by the Davis Construction Company. It has the seating capacity of three hundred and fifty. In the basement is a parish hall, which will seat three hundred. This has a stage, with two dressing rooms, two choir robing rooms and a kitchen. The rectory is attached to the church, and has eight rooms and two baths.

The Rev. James McNeal Wheatley is minister-in-charge.

Flourishing Church.

A tie for the largest confirmation class in its history was established on Sunday, November 17, at St. Mark's Church, Fall River, Mass., when Bishop Slattery confirmed sixty-seven candidates, presented by the rector, the Rev. Paul Micou. The earlier class of the same number was presented about eight years ago by the Rev. Charles W. Findlay, now rector of St. Andrews' Church, Albany, N. Y., Of this year's class twenty were adults.

St. Mark's Church has also just completed a very successful Every Member Canvass, held early because of the annual December bazaar. In spite of the cotton textile depression, which greatly affects all Fall River, pledges were increased one-third, from $4,200 to over $6,200, nearly 500 individuals pledging. The pledges, "for others", now very nearly equal the apportionment.

Rt. Rev. F. F. Reese, D. D., Bishop.

Dr. Holt Discusses Christian Marriage.

At the invitation of the Diocesan Department of Christian Social Service, the Rev. Harold Holt, Assistant Executive Secretary of the Department of Christian Social Service of the National Council, addressed the clergy and a representative group of physicians and social service workers at St. Paul's Church, Savannah, on Friday evening, November 15, on the matter of establishing a Family Welfare Institute in the Diocese to build up the idea of Christian marriage as against the popular, or neopagan idea of marriage. No action was taken, as Dr. Holt's time was limited, but it is hoped that he can give us more time at a future date

While in the city, Dr. Holt inspected the Church Home for Orphans and was carried to see "Bethesda", the oldest orphanage in the United States. Bethesda was founded by the Rev. George Whitfield, a minister of the Church in 1740, but is now non-sectarian and houses one hundred happy boys.

Letter Dimissory.

Savannah, Ga.—On November 29, Bishop Reese received and accepted the Letter Dimissory for the Rev. Joseph Burton, Archdeacon, from the District of Beaufort, S. C., to the Diocese of Georgia. The Rev. Mr. Burton assumed the rectorship of St. Michael and All Angels' Church, this city, on November 1.

New Organ.

Americus, Ga.—A new organ was recently dedicated by the Rev. James B. Lawrence, D. D., rector of Calvary Church. The instrument is the gift of the late William Harrold, Misses Anna and Elizabeth Harrold and Mrs. Thomas Harrold, and was given as a memorial to members of the Harrold family, who have sung in Calvary Church choir. The old organ has been given to St. Andrew's Church, Douglas, and, after being renovated, is bringing happiness to that congregation.

Annual Parish Dinner.

One of the big events on the year's program of Christ Church, Little Rock, was the annual parish dinner held November 20, when, according to common testimony, a larger number of Episcopalians were in attendance than ever before at a social function under the auspices of the Church. The new parish house lent itself in beautiful fashion to this function. The chief speaker was the Rt. Rev. Thos. F. Gailor, D. D., Bishop of Tennessee. Bishop and Mrs. Winchester were also in attendance. Doxology, the invocation by Bishop Gailor, musical selections by the male chorus of Christ Church, a demonstration of the work and ideals of the young people by a selected group of boys and girls of the parish. This was followed by a musical selection rendered by the male quartette of Christ Church Choir. Bishop Gailor was then introduced and delivered a fine address on the value of Christ and His ideals in the progress of mankind and the responsibility of the individual Christian to see that the program of the Church is carried into effect. Then was sung a solo by Mrs. R. L. McKenney. Mr. J. Curran Conway then spoke of the inspiring history of Christ Church Parish and delivered a call to the present constituency to carry on what had been handed down to them. A brief address was delivered by the Rev. Dr. Witsell, the rector of the church. After the singing of "Stand Up, Stand Up, Stand Up for Jesus", by the assembly, they were dismissed by the benediction, pronounced by the rector. Mr. Haley Bennett was the gracious toastmaster of the occasion.

Mr. Thomas E. Wood, the active chairman of the Executive Council of the diocese, has been touring the diocese in the interest of diocesan and national Church work. He has visited the vacant parishes, of which there are six, and a number of parishes to which he was invited by the clergyman.

In Camden, the Sunday nearest Armistice Day, was used for commemorating that event; and the addresses stressed our need for and desire for peace.

Two addresses were made, one by a veteran from the western front, who had left a leg on the field of battle. The other was made by a veteran of the Italian front. He said that there was an Armistice on that front at ten o'clock on November 7, 1918. They could not glory nor need for another.

In Camden there was a Union Service on Thanksgiving Day, in which all Christians participated. There was an early Communion Service in St. John's Church in addition.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Rt. Rev. Thomas J. Garland, D. D., Bishop
Rt. Rev. Francis M. Taitt, S. T. D., Coadjutor.

St. Andrew's Day Celebrated.

Two hundred and fifteen men and boys, the latter about fifty in number, attended the services and meetings of the Pennsylvania Diocesan Assembly in celebration of St. Andrew's Day. The place was the Church of the Epiphany in West Philadelphia, and the hours from five to about 9:30 Saturday night, November 30. The general theme of the observance was, "Why We Are Here" and the text for guidance of the thought of the meeting, "To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth" (John 18:37).

Choral evening prayer and sermon came at five o'clock, when the nave of the beautiful church was well filled, and Bishop Lloyd of New York spoke from his heart, as he has done in so many Brotherhood gatherings. He stressed the theme of the meeting.

Supper was served in the parish house and at its close a business meeting, at which Percival H. Granger was relected President of the Assembly, and also as an additional member of the National Council for Pennsylvania. The usual other officers were elected, and a large Executive Committee that has been meeting monthly for many years, and guiding the work of the Assembly. Haydon O. Merrill, of the Church of the Saviour, was reelected President of the Juniors.

Three twenty-minute addresses were given at the large evening conference, Dr. A. D. Parker, a layman of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Rosemont, speaking on "God and Man"; Bishop Taitt of the Diocese of "Man and the Church"; and President H. Lawrence Choate of the National Brotherhood on "The Place of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew."

A brief service of preparation for the Advent Corporate Communion was conducted by the Rev. Dr. Tomkins of the Church of the Holy Trinity, the men and boys leaving quietly for their homes before ten o'clock, with the Service of Holy Communion in anticipation in their several parishes.

The observance in all its features was the most successful in many years, both from the standpoint of attendance and representation, and was the culmination of many weeks of planning on the part of the Assembly leaders and the rector and Brotherhood men of the Epiphany. Probably at no time in recent years have so many representative clergy attended an Assembly meeting.

Personal Notes

ORDINATIONS.

Mr. C. Harold Douglas, assistant at the Church of the Epiphany, Washington, D. C., was ordained to the priesthood at Washington Cathedral on Tuesday morning, November 26, by Bishop Freeman. Dr. Phillips, rector of the Church of the Epiphany, presented the candidate and preached the sermon, and the Cathedral Choir rendered the music.

On Tuesday, November 26, in the Cathedral of Our Merciful Saviour, Faribault, Minnesota, Bishop McElwain ordained the following men as deacons: Peter E. Spehr, presented by the Rev. Frank Zoubek, of St. Paul; Robert G. Purrington, presented by the Rev. Frank Zoubek; Edward A. James, presented by the Rev. A. H. Lealtad, of St. Paul; Paul J. Higgins, presented by the Rev. Paul R. Palmer, of Benson; and, acting for the Bishop of Central New York, Ernest W. Churchill, presented by the Rev. W. J. Spicer, of Minneapolis; and, acting for the Bishop of Iowa, Hector W. Thompson, presented by the Rev. A. C. Blake of Anoka. The preacher was the Rev. Dr. F. F. Kramer, Warden of Seabury Divinity School.

All of these ordinands are at present completing their studies at Seabury Divinity School and will continue there until the end of the academic year. All are doing missionary work in the Diocese of Minnesota, under the direction of the Archdeacon, with the exception of Mr. Thompson, who is doing missionary work in the Diocese of Iowa.

DEATHS.

Funeral services for the Rev. William E. Warren, sixty, rector of St. Luke's Church, Eddystone, who died suddenly at his home, November 28, were held Saturday afternoon in the church. Bishop Francis M. Taitt officiated.

Mr. Warren was formerly rector of St. James' Church, Moore, and once was rector of a church in Independence, Kansas. He was born in Florida and was a graduate of Seabury Seminary. He is survived by his wife and two daughters.

A Clergyman Looks at the Flag

FROM THE BOSTON TRANSCRIPT

Rt. Rev. Paul Jones, who will be acting Episcopal Bishop of Southern Ohio after November 1st, tells a Boston audience that the American flag should not be displayed in public school rooms. Such display is, he says, "dangerous fetish worship which promotes thoughts of war among school children." This sage conclusion was uttered in a congenial atmosphere. Another speaker denounced the present system of "imperialism, capitalism and militarism," and Mr. Jones himself informed his audience, of about one hundred, that this country has to-day two religions, of nationalism and of the church, and that "it is impossible for a man to worship at both altars."

The doctrine that a man cannot love his God and his country at the same time is one of the novelties of the twentieth century, most strikingly exemplified in Soviet Russia, where the authorities have solved the problem it suggests by abolishing the church. For the flag of Imperial Russia has been substituted the red flag of revolution, but not the cross, which is the symbol of the church; or, more strictly speaking, of one group of churches. Mr. Jones, however, is not a man of distinctions. Communist concern for the education of youth in the way it should go is no less intense than that of the Bishop, and the Pioneer Camps from which the American flag has been excluded are now beginning to rival the Boy Scout camps in the zeal of their teaching. The symbol there is a pin, with gold hammer and sickle, black fire logs and blaze, indicating that the fires of Communism are bright everywhere. The campaign cry of these youths is, "War is coming! Join the Young Pioneers!" The war, of course, is against capitalism and the American system of government.

We are still old-fashioned enough to believe that the clergyman who advocates abandonment of the American flag and what it stands for has no place in American society, whatever his pretensions as a leader in his church. Neither do we believe that he represents his church, or that such doctrine as Mr. Jones preaches will not be repudiated by his people. They will take their stand rather with a man who hates war as bitterly as Mr. Jones, and knows more of it, the former national commander of the American Legion, whose view of the American flag we would substitute for the conception of this Episcopal Bishop: "That piece of red, white and blue bunting means five thousand years of struggle upward. It is the full-grown flower of ages of fighting for liberty. Your flag stands for humanity, for an equal opportunity to all sons of men. Other flags mean a glorious past, this flag a glorious future. It is not so much the flag of our fathers as it is the flag of our children, and of all children's children yet unborn. It is not the flag of your king—it is the flag of yourself and of all your neighbors. Don't be ashamed when your throat chokes and the tears come, as you see it flying from the masts of our ships on all the seas or floating from every flagstaff of the Republic. You will never have a worthier emotion, for our flag is the symbol of liberty." If this symbol, rightly interpreted instead of maligned, as by Mr. Jones, has not a place in the American school room, what has?

IN THE CATHEDRAL

To the Editor of the Transcript:

May I thank you for your editorial of October 29th, "A Clergyman Looks at the Flag," read by many people miles away from where it was written. Their reaction to it enables me to assure you that your conclusion is correct that "Rev. Mr. Jones would be found not to represent the Episcopal Church, and that his doctrines will be repudiated." In the hope of furthering that end, will you accept "A Churchwoman Looks at the Cathedral"? The Cathedral Church of St. Paul, Boston, for years has stood on a business thoroughfare, a beacon and a haven for men and women seeking spiritual refreshment. And they have found it. For some, that day is well-nigh spent. Discordant, non-essential notes have been too often struck. Granting the privilege to all men to surround themselves with a world after their own likeness, we ask is it wise and just that civic and religious freebooters should be given opportunity to infest with individual prejudices a Cathedral Church? It has been well said that "Few honest men could tolerate a faith which contravened the deliverance of intelligence. But sentiment, tradition, the compelling power of desires and emotions deep-bedded in the tissues of the human race come welling up to give direction to man's hopes and dreams and faiths." So believing, let us in our churches guard our traditions, practices and habits with their inseparable emblems, symbols of faith and loyalty—the Cross, the Flag.

USING THE CHURCH

To the Editor of the Transcript:

I have addressed the following letter to the Very Reverend, the Dean, and the Chapter of Saint Paul's Episcopal Cathedral, Boston:

The writer, a layman of the Diocese of Massachusetts, most courteously calls your attention to scathing reports and editorial and private comments in Boston newspapers of Tuesday, Wednesday and Friday last, concerning a political conference held on Monday last, in the crypt of the Cathedral, under the auspices of The Fellowship of Reconciliation, a communist-internationalist association, whose open purpose was to enlist the church as a political force in support of a world-politic known as Internationalism.

He would further call your attention to previous use of the crypt by The Church League for Industrial Democracy, a Socialist organization, for meetings whose open purpose, actually attempted during the communist silk strike at Passaic, was to line up the church in support of organized labor's perennial campaign for monopoly of employment and fixing of wages by coercion of employers, non-union workers and the public alike.

In passing, he would note that that league (whose printed Statement of Principles sets forth the purpose, inter alia, of changing management and curricula in theological seminaries, so as to enlist and graduate socialist clergy) is strongly intrenched in the faculty of the Episcopal Divinity School at Cambridge; and that both fellowship and league are closely allied by interlocking memberships and directorships with many conspicuously active socialist-communist groups in the United States, especially The American Civil Liberties Union, The Trades Union Educational League, and The Friends of Soviet Russia, also with the Third International of Moscow.

Finally, he calls your attention to the world-familiar communist policy of "boring from within" into all sorts of social, educational, political and even religious organizations; confirming the famous dictum of Friedrich Engels to Florence Kelley, that communism "must learn to build the communist state with non-communist hands."

The writer does not question the entire sincerity and unselfishness of his radical brethen. He does question the integrity of their attempt to purloin the church as their forum of agitation. He would by no means "muzzle the clergy.". There are everywhere innumerable social and political organizations and forums such as Ford Hall, where any radical, clerical or lay can freely and legitimately voice any social or political creed for which he stands. But the Church of God is for other uses. "My house is the house of prayer," said Christ.

MEN NEEDED

AND OF THE RIGHT KIND---MORE AND MORE

One of the facts of the hour is the appalling need of men on the one hand, and the appalling lack of men on the other, for the ministry. It is a matter for the laity. It is generally thought that the Bishops and college leaders and clergy are the people to look after this business, but the time has come when the laity should lay upon their hearts this most imperious of church problems and do all that they can by prayer and practical effort to seek and find candidates for the ministry and missionary field.

I would like to make the following suggestions: That the clergy must constantly be impressing upon their congregations the duty of parents consecrating at least one of their children from their childhood to the sacred ministry, and of constantly reminding Sunday School superintendents and teachers in city and country alike it is their duty to be on the lookout for those who may prove good, fit and worthy to be messengers of Jesus Christ.

That once or twice a year upon some special Sunday a very special service should be held for the definite purpose of asking the scholars, especially in the Secondary and older divisions, to make a personal decision for Christ, and to definitely consecrate themselves to the Lord, and if they could, to offer themselves for the ministry, or the missionary work of the Church.

That once a year also it should be possible to have an appeal Sunday, when the glory of the ministry and the glory of preaching Christ to the 800,000,000 of the present generation of heathen who have never heard the Gospel might be earnestly set forth.

One thing the writer feels very deeply with regard to this appeal question, and that is that the appeal to consecrate lives to the ministry and the missionary field should never be along the line of salary or stipend, adequate or inadequate. The first thing should be to make them hear the Lord's call and realize its grandeur, and in the splendor of noble self-sacrifice say, "Here am I, send me," knowing that the heart of faith whom the Lord send out He will surely provide for. What our young men should feel is that the first thing the minister wants to have is not emolument, but a field. His pre-eminent desire should be a sphere big enough for a living loving man, big enough to evoke all his powers, big enough to give him a full day's work. That should be his dream and his desire. If he seeks first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness, he may know perfectly well that all needful things will be added unto him. In all our appeals the foremost article and the first plank in the platform should be that the Lord's first need is the consecrated will and life, and when that is given he can find in the ministry a sphere that will challenge all his energies, elicit all his abilities, evoke all his spiritual force, and put him into the place where he has the biggest work on the face of the globe.—Dyson Hague.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

"God wants those who are ready."

Sharing a gift is the best gratitude for it.

"We pray to God, in the long run, as we think of Him."

If any man's faith in a living God has become weak, let him read the history of Christian missions.—Ex.

"Christ never asks of us such busy labor
As leaves no time for resting at His feet;
The waiting attitude of expectation
He oftenest counts a service most complete."

Prayer for everything brings anxious care for nothing.

Faith, like an unsuspecting child
Serenely resting on its mother's arm,
Reposing every care upon her God,
Sleeps on His bosom, and expects no harm.

—Selected.

My God, it is my poverty that aims at Thee. It is my humility that soars to Thee. It is my nothingness that dares to hope for Thee. It is from my ashes that I rise to Thee. From the grave of my buried past I climb into the light of a new day. Accept my poverty of soul, for I have forgotten the things that are behind.—George Matheson.

Some one has said: "He who teaches a child how to read and does not teach him what to read puts a dangerous weapon into his hand."

Rembrandt's counsel to his pupil Hoogstraten when the latter teased him with questions might well be borne in mind by such as are troubled with doubts. "Try," he said, "to put well in practice what you already know. In so doing you will, in good time, discover the hidden things which you now inquire about."

An alarming weakness among Christians is that we are producing Christian activities faster than we are producing Christian experience and Christian faith; that the discipline of our souls and the deepening of our acquaintance with God are not proving sufficiently thorough to enable us to meet the expansion of opportunity and responsibility of our generation.—John R. Mott.

I used to think that God's gifts were on shelves one above the other, and that the taller we grew in character the easier we could reach them I find now that God's gifts are on shelves one beneath the other, and that it is not a question of growing taller, but of stooping lower, and that we have to go down, always down, to get His best gifts.

All of us, if we would fulfil God's purpose for us must, say as Dr. Grenfell, of Labrador, once said, "I made up my mind to do what I thought Christ would do if He were in my place". For God has so created the world and us that never can His will for us prevail until we have made up our minds to let it prevail.—Canadian Churchman.

MISTAKES

Human wisdom is based on observation of mistakes of humans, including especially our own. It has been said that the really wise man is he who does not make the same mistake more than three times. Now is a good moment to apply practical and close thought to our conduct for the fast approaching Christmas. A discreet and wholesome way to begin is to recall, frankly and sincerely and without attempts to shield our pride and vanity from our consciences and sense, Christmas seasons through which we have come and which we have marred or spoiled for ourselves and others, or both, by mistakes, follies, sins. Most of us can accuse ourselves justly of occasional mean, small, sordid motives in our preparations and decisions. Some of us have been lavish and absurdly reckless when we should have been carefully and decently economical. Some of us have pinched parsimoniously when we could afford to be liberal. Some of us have failed to be appreciative and grateful as we should have been for what was done for us, have expected unreasonably and secretly harbored and encouraged unjust bitterness and resentments. Some of us have forgotten or neglected when we should have remembered and been tenderly considerate and have bestowed where there was no need nor obligation nor probability of real benefit or appreciation. We have hurried and harried and busied ourselves unduly with trifles, unimportant things, ostentations, petty details, exaggerated to gnawing irritations, exasperations, disturbances of temper, making storm and cloud where and when there should have been serene peace and good will and brightness. We have exhumed from the past and revived and nourished and brooded upon old griefs and sorrows and created new grievances with which to make ourselves sullen and miserable, sour or tempestuous, when the Christmas spirit should have inspired us to radiate cheerfulness and love and hope. All these things the great majority of us must know, if we search our memories faithfully, we have done and for which we ought to be very profoundly sorry and ashamed.

By God's mercy we are living into another Christmas season, may learn from our errors, blunders, follies and faults, and resolve earnestly that with God's help we will not repeat them nor commit others. Few of us are so favored that everything will be exactly as we hope and plan. We cannot control all circumstances, wills, motives or dispositions. We can control ourselves. We cannot compel everybody to do for us or to us as we would like to have them do, but we can guide and govern ourselves by the Golden Rule. Now is the right time to begin the recalling, repenting and resolving. "Nine days more for Christmas shopping," the advertisements will tell us next Monday. Nine days, too, for Christmas divesting and investing and making within ourselves of Christmas good and goods. Nine days through which to divest ourselves of angers and animosities, harsh thought and judgments, selfishness, baseness, spiritual and mental fogs and disturbance, for storing within ourselves high and clean resolutions and determinations to do with what we have the best we can, with loving consideration and kindliness and thoughtfulness. Gentle charity for the faults and weaknesses and mistakes of others, courageous and tireless effort to correct our own, will be timely and fruitful work for these nine days. These will prepare and fit us for heartfelt participation and pleasure in the joys that come, for smoothing and smiling and putting out of mind and memory the mischances, oversights, failures and inability to do as we would like to do, temptation to do more than we should. So, whatever our stations or conditions or limitations may be, or our by-gone mistakes may have been, our gratitude for the Supreme Benefaction we commemorate shall be fervent and pure and from tranquil souls and the "Merry Christmas" our lips utter be a true echo from the innermost recesses of our hearts.

Alfred B. Williams.

EVANGELISM.

The Archbishops of Canterbury and York in a recent pastoral letter say:

"We are enclosed by a material civilization great in its achievements, confident in its self-sufficiency, in which no place is found for God or even for the spiritual life of man. The Church of Christ is called to give witness to the reality and claim of the things unseen and eternal. How can it give witness to these things unless they are manifestly real and powerful in the lives of its members?"

Dr. Morrison of the Christian Century says: "The forms and habits of religion remain, but the definite content of personal conviction is being dissolved. The outside of religion—its institutions, churches, philanthropies, theologies, and literature—is prosperous enough, but its inside is bare and lean. Religion as an experience is dangerously near insolvency."

The above opinions, and others in like vein, indicate that something is wrong, and the roots of it run deep. There are many interpretations, but no simple cure. Something has gotten into the air of today that cools down our enthusiasm for Christ and dims our certainty of God. Men seem to walk in a mental twilight. They are absorbed in the things of earth and a light has gone out of their sky.

A Church woman said the other day: "Can any one be certain of God today." Think of that. Another remarked, "I don't seem to get anything out of the church services any more, and I don't know what's the matter."

Evangelism is a call to clergy and people to revive within themselves and others a consciousness of the reality of Christ's presence. Jesus in choosing His followers took them from every walk of life. Some were fishermen, some tax gatherers, and some scholars, but all had to be filled with the Spirit of God before they were ready to do their work.

We have in the Church today many people of learning, many of culture, but their lives are lacking in religious fervor. Year after year goes by without their having brought any one into the Church; day after day passes, and they do not speak to others of Christ and His Church. No testimony to the goodness of God and the power of His love falls from their lips. There are homes where the family altar is brokn down, where the Scriptures are seldom read, and God's name never spoken. The Spirit is not there.

We need to put a silver trumpet to our lips and blow a charge—"Forward! Forward! Any where for Christ! Anything for Christ! Forward! in the face of any difficulties for Christ. Forward! Risking all for Christ."—Selected.

PART III.

Where the Real Strength of the Church Lies.

THE most important question for discussion at the present time seems to be; where does the strength and power of the Church really lie? This would seem to some to be as great a mystery as the secret of Samson's strength.

In the first place then, the real power of the Church does not lie on its institutional side. This side of the Church's life depends in a great measure upon the momentum of historical tradition, which, of course, is very considerable, and should by no means be despised.

But the Church as an institution has many rivals, often much more wide-awake and more continuously at work than herself. Take the Church Missions House, the centre of the organized life of the Church; the headquarters of its business affairs, in the great work of Church extension. While it is busy enough and awake to the needs of the Church's life, yet as an institutional centre it is overshadowed by office buildings, which in very many cases, represent a great deal more, both in business dealt with and money handled, than the Church Missions House. The Steel Corporation or General Motors, to say nothing of others, are giants in comparison. No, the Church's real power lies somewhere else.

Again it might be thought by some that the intellectual life of the Church must add very considerably to its influence, especially since our Church stands well in the front rank in that respect.

While sound learning is an asset by no means to be despised, especially when dedicated to the service of God and His Church, yet it can hardly be said that the immense output of literature on the subject of religion, during the last generation or two has placed the Christian Church in a more commanding position in the world's estimation. In fact, it is a question whether the constant discussion of matters which have been thrashed out over and over again from time immemorial, has not added to the confusion, and caused more unsettlement than ever before.

If, then, the real power of the Church does not lie on its institutional or its intellectual side, where is it to be found? The answer to this is clear that this power does not reside in the Church at all, but in her divine Head, Jesus Christ, the Son of God. If the Church is to have any commanding influence upon the world it can only be so by the exercise of power derived from Him It is here that the importance of emphasizing the divinity of Christ is clearly apparent, because it is only divine power which can enable the Church to become an effective instrument in the progressive raising of humanity to a higher level. The moral teaching of Christ and its social implications are very important, and must be upheld as an ideal for men to follow, but rules of morality would be as ineffective in bringing in the Kingdom of God as the law was to make Israel a righteous nation, if it were not for the fact that Christ now comes into the hearts of men by His Holy Spirit and becomes an energizing power in their lives.

With Christ, the Son of God, as her divine Head, and herself "the Fulness of Him that Filleth all in all", she can appeal to men to cooperate with her through the power of the Living Christ, to whom all power and authority in heaven and earth has been intrusted, to make this world a very different place from what it is and more in conformity with what Christ would have it be.

It is a mistake to suppose that men and women of today will not believe in Christ as the Son of God. It may be hard to convince them because the Church herself shows so little evidence that she really believes this herself, since she does not seem to be conscious of the possession of this transcendent power; nor does there seem to be much evidence of its influence upon the lives and characters of her members. For sad to say, sometimes those without feel that those within the Church are no better, if as good as themselves.

But that the power of Christ is real is shown by the fact that He has manifested His Power in the lives of multitudes of His followers in all lands, and at all periods of the history of the Church.

Take the case of St. Paul; his influence has been world-wide and will continue to the end of time, and the secret of that stupendous influence is revealed in his own words: "Nevertheless I live yet not I, but Christ liveth in me and the life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God who loved me and gave Himself for me."

If Jesus Christ were allowed to manifest His power through the lives of all those who profess to be and call themselves His followers, then the Christian Church could conquer the world, because she would be the greatest power in the world.

Christ has shown what wonderful things He can do, through the many burning and shining lights scattered throughout the world during the centuries of the Christian era; and it should be the business of the Church to proclaim this power of her Divine Head, and to seek to awaken in the hearts of her members a burning desire, a holy ambition to be so filled with the Spirit of Christ, that He may be able to manifest His Power and Presence through them.

This is the only way in which the Church can prove that her religion is from God, and can thus conquer the world. It is not by her machinery or organization that she can become a mighty power among men, but through being able to produce radiant personalities, who can bear witness for Christ in a far more effective and convincing way than by any amount of organization or apologies for Christianity.

So would His Kingdom come speedily, whereas, if we so-called Christians are content to be only Christians in name, and without the inspiration of the Spirit of Christ, then will His Kingdom tarry, and His hopes of its speedy coming be indefinitely delayed and postponed.

During the Great War men's minds were moved by a Great Hope; that when the conflict was over we would not sink back again to the old level, but would move on to a new and higher order of things. This hope has in a great measure faded away. The Christian Church failed to rise to the greatness of the opportunity, but the Hope, though sadly obscured, is not lost. Christ, the Divine Head of the Church, can use His power to create as great and radiant personalities as the Church has ever seen, who can go forward under His Leadership to a higher and nobler conception of human life and thus bear convincing witness to the world that Jesus Christ is the Son of God.

The Call to the Church.

O Bride of Christ, beloved by Him,
Why are thine eyes of faith so dim?
Dost thou not know His mighty power
Is thine to use this very hour?

The world in awful anguish lies
And heavenward lifts its pleading eyes,
Body of Christ, His Hands, and Feet
Thou must the mighty issue meet.

Fulness of Him, who filleth all,
Who never heedless, hears thy call,
His glorious gifts are thine to share
With all His creatures everywhere.

O Church of God, why dost thou deem
His promises an empty dream?
Shake off thine unbelief and be
His angel to humanity.

(To be concluded.)

FAVORITE SCRIPTURE VERSE.

(In this space each week will appear a favorite passage of Scripture as sent in by a different reader. Every one is, therefore, invited to send us their favorite verse. It is suggested all who can, join with the rest of us in committing to memory the verse which appears here each week, including its location in the Holy Book; and in due time your memory chest will be laden with choice, eternal treasures, indeed. "Thy word have I hid in my heart, that I might not sin against thee." Ps. 119:11.)

This week the following verse was submitted by Mr. George Kemp, of Richmond, Va.:

"If thou turn away thy foot from the sabbath, from doing thy pleasure on my holy day; and call the sabbath a delight, the holy of the Lord, honourable; and shalt honour him, not doing thine own ways, nor finding thine own pleasure, nor speaking thine own words:

Then shalt thou delight thyself in the Lord; and I will cause thee to ride upon the high places of the earth, and feed thee with the heritage of Jacob thy father: for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it."—Isa. 58:13, 14.

XX.

WE may now contemplate the joyous possession of the land by the descendants of that man, Abraham, to whom and his seed it was given by an inviolable covenant. Let us be reverent as we trace the unfolding of that mutual understanding between "the friend of God" (2 Chron. 20:7; Isa. 41:8; Jas. 2:23) and the Jehovah whose word cannot be broken (Isa. 55:11; Jno. 10:35).

When he was called out of Ur of the Chaldees, Abraham was assured that in connection with the joyous possession of the land all the earth should be blessed (Gen. 12:1-3; 13:14-17; 18:18; 26:4; Gal. 3:14). This compact was renewed after the victory over the invading kings (Gen. 15:1-5); again when his name was changed from Abram to Abraham (Gen. 17:1-8). The apostle Paul warns us that

The Promises of God to Abraham, and to his seed, cannot be abrogated by the provisions of the Christian dispensation. For we read in Rom. 11:25, 26, "Blindness in part is happened unto Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in. And so all Israel shall be saved, as it is written, 'There shall come out of Zion the Deliverer and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob'." And in verse 20 we have the assurance that "the gifts and calling of God are without repentance".

Now the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews, in reviewing the covenant with Abraham, sums up the argument by the concluding words, "These all, having obtained a good report through faith, received not the promise; God having provided some better thing for us, that they without us should not be made perfect" (Heb. 11:34). History vindicates this postulate. Abraham did not inherit the land in his day, but sojourned in it as a stranger (Heb. 11:8-10). But the preservation of the race of which he is the father (Matt. 3:9; Jno. 8:39) is as we have shown previously. And the presence of that race in our midst is the pledge of the purpose of God to give them the land in His own time and way.

At present we may be heartily alive to the moving in that ancient people of the pulsations of hope that they may yet possess the inheritance. The student of prophecy beholds with deep concern the ebb and flow of that modern movement called Zionism. At one time it seems to be most assured that the occupancy of the land will be a question of but months; again we hear of deflections from the ranks, of hesitancy, of discouragements unexpected, of utter repudiation of the entire scheme on the part of some. But that has been characteristic of all great developments. And we may not be surprised.

However, we who see the plan of God in His Word know that the method of obtaining possession of the land which is now operating among the Jews is not God's manifested way. He will suffer them to go there in unbelief of the Messiahship of the Son of God.

They Will Resort to Statecraft to get their possession; He intends to give it to them. They see only the earth-plane of acquisition; He will show them the heavenly view. But of this we may be sure: They will be in the land and evidently occupying it in national consciousness. The flag is ready for unfurling; the elements of diplomacy are ripening; the expectation of making Jerusalem the center of a great commonwealth is a burning light on their pathway. Plans for the restoration of the temple are ardently contemplated. Vague rumors reach us of columns and chapiters being ordered in the marble yards of Southern Europe. It has even been hinted that if Mohammedan resistance to the surrender of the temple precincts be insurmountable, another site will be secured. We are told that a school for the Levites is operating in which the revival of the ancient ritual is anticipated; and as well preparation for the renewal of the priestly family and the sacrifices which since the fall of Jerusalem in A. D. 70 have ceased.

All this must warm our hearts; for we do know that when our Lord Jesus comes again and the House of David abiding in the old precincts. That is clearly outlined in Zech. 12:10; and is indicated by Mal. 3:1, when the sudden coming of the Lord to His temple is declared. To relegate this latter prophecy to our Lord's presentation in the temple as a child may be permissible for illustration (Luke 2:21-38), but it is not a complete fulfilment. For we must not forget that as Zech. 12:10 unfolds a bitter mourning over the tragedy of Calvary, when they shall look upon Him whom they pierced (through the agency of the Romans), so when He comes suddenly to His temple, He will sit as a refiner and purifier of silver; and the sons of Levi shall be purged as is silver and gold. Therefore, we have much for which to be grateful in that our eyes may see and our senses apprehend the beginning of the unfolding of the marvelous drama of the ages.

He Will Find the Inhabitants of Jerusalem

The land is now being possessed in the Birth-pangs of a Longed-for Liberation.

In the days of the Czar of Russia multitudes of Jews wearily trod the rough roads, from the scenes of their persecution to Palestine for the comfort of at least being buried in the soil of their long-ago departed ancestors. And every effort now being made to bring about the establishment of a Jewish state is fraught with perplexity and heavy burden-bearing. But when He gives them the land it will be for joyous possession. God has declared His pledge of remembrance in the assurance of Deut. 11:12, "A land which the Lord thy God careth for; for the eyes of the Lord are always upon it, from the beginning of the year to the end of the year". And again, the fulfilment of the divine purpose will be as "days of heaven upon earth" (Deut. 11:21). Then at last shall Jerusalem be the joy of the whole earth; and from it shall go forth the law to exalt the nation and to commission its people as messengers of good will to all nations (Ps. 48:1-3; Isa. 1-3). We have long rejoiced in the adornment of our ordination services by the classical rendering,

"How Lovely Are the Messengers", oblivious of the ultimate intention of the prophecy upon which its inspiring words were founded, "How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace, that bringeth good tidings of good, that publisheth salvation, that saith unto Zion, 'Thy God reigneth'!" "Break forth into joy, sing together, ye waste places of Jerusalem; for the Lord hath comforted his people, he hath redeemed Jerusalem" (Isa. 52:7, 9).

This will be the era during which the wonderful promises of Isa. 60 shall be accomplished. Far too long has the Church monopolized that matchless chapter as exclusively pertinent to its own glory. Let us be honest and allow, as we have previously seen, that the vision of Isaiah was concerning Judah and Jerusalem (Isa. 1:1; 2:1). For truth to tell, the titles over the chapters and column headings are not authoritative. It is not the Church, but the nation, restored to the favor of God and in its own divinely conferred possession that is the primal perspective of this glowing prediction. Here in this chapter lie the promises of enlargement, supernal light, the votive offerings of the Gentiles. This people is to be "A Joy of Many Generations".

"Violence is no more heard in the land, wasting nor destruction within its borders." In Isa. 49:13, 23, the exultant cry goes forth, "Sing, O heavens, and be joyful, O earth; and break forth into singing, O mountains; for the Lord hath comforted his people, and will have mercy upon his afflicted". "Kings shall be thy nursing fathers and queens thy nursing mothers."

Let us stand in retrospect at the Council of Jerusalem, and hear the presiding officer, James, utter his pronunciamento, after St. Peter had described how God had through him made the announcement of salvation to the Gentiles through the household of Cornelius (Acts 10): "Simeon (Simon) hath declared how God at the first did visit the Gentiles to take out of them a people for his name. And to this agree the words of the prophets; as it is written, 'After this (evidently the incoming of the fulness of the Gentiles of Rom. 11:25), I will return and will build again the tabernacle of David which is fallen; and I will build again the ruins thereof, and I will set it up; that the residue of men might seek after the Lord, and all the Gentiles, upon whom my name is called, saith the Lord, who doeth all these things. Known unto God are all his works from the beginning of the creation.'" (Acts 15:13-18; Amos 9:11-12.)

Surely we must see and believe that "all that the mouth of the Lord hath spoken" challenges our recognition of this wondrous truth that from the "valley of dry bones" (Ezek. 37) there shall rise a mighty nation, joyously inheriting the land given to Abraham, after the centuries of wandering, blindness and unbelief. And certainly we shall echo the Psalmist's exultant cry, "Sing unto the Lord a new song; for he hath done marvelous things" (Ps. 98:1).

WHY IS MODERN CHRISTIANITY UNCONVINCING?

By S. M. Shoemaker, Jr.

Rector of Calvary Church, New York City.

(Note: The following sermon was delivered in the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, New York City, on Sunday morning, November 10.)

"If the salt has lost its savor, wherewith shall it be salted?"—St. Matt. 5:13.

"If salt becomes insipid, what can make it salt again?"—Moffatt.

IF we are not, we all ought to be concerned over the widespread decline in the influence of organized religion in the modern world. We find the churches impotent to make the claims of Jesus Christ compelling, or even relevant, for great masses of typical modern people. Those who most need the power and the peace of religious assurance are often those who are farthest from its reach. Any Christian who is not disturbed about the way matters stand is an ostrich with his head in the sand.

Now, it is perfectly natural for us to put the cause where we are not ourselves responsible for what has happened. We can say justly that the world in which we live has gone mad after pleasure and will not think about its soul. We can say that our generation is infected with the materialism which has been born of our joint prosperity and scientific progress. We can say that for a variety of reasons they are preoccupied with this world to the exclusion of the claims and interests of the other, and have forgotten and fallen away from the religious ideals which they learned in their youth. It is easy to say "they" and point the finger.

But I suspect that the real reason why modern Christianity is not more convincing lies in the Christians themselves. The problem is "we", not "they". The salt has lost its savor. Modern Christianity is tasteless to the palate of the ordinary unbeliever and outsider. When original Christianity broke on the pagan world, a world in many respects rather like our own, it broke with good news—NEWS, mind you, not advice. The lives of that little company about Jesus were headlines in the world of their time, and they were so different from the life about them, so superior to it in their faith and their unconventionality and their love for each other and their triumph over temptation and death, that the pagan world was startled, excited, almost frightened. This thing did not depend upon great minds or outstanding personalities. The remarkable thing about Christianity was precisely that it could create so much of a stir with such a lot of human scrubs and nondescripts, all of whose faculties and perceptions and values had been so immeasurably heightened through their contact with Jesus Christ. Christianity won out over paganism, not through superior intellectual arguments, but by a more workable way of life.

We are trying today to argue with an unbelieving generation by the refinement of our teaching methods, by running after the intellectuals, by the efficiency of our church-machinery, and by the outward appeal of large memberships, great edifices and stately services. These things say almost nothing to our generation. They think about a bare-footed Carpenter, and His little company of friends; His faith in God and His direct attack on human hearts —and they wonder what on earth all these religious accessories have got to do with Him. They know that there is no necessary connection between the outward prosperity of the Church and its inward fidelity: the Church of Jesus' time was successful enough, but the heart was gone out of it. It had as good teachers in it as the times could supply, but for all their meticulous information they neglected the great matters of mercy and the love of God. They had their great Temple and their rituals and their sacrifices: but there was no pith nor savor. None of these outward things will save the Church of our day. We are wide of the mark if we think that the intellectual approach, or more money, or bigger churches, or better organization can save the soul of the Church, or commend it to our age. The only way to argue with the kind of age in which we live is to argue by means of a richer and more adventurous life. Our age is no different from any other past age in some respects: for all our fancied intellectuality and modernism, we still stand in the presence of the mystery of our own existence, bounded by nothingness and death. Evil is still here, and conscience. The great mysteries have never had the heart of them plucked out: only the religious interpretations furnishes a working clue. The best argument for religion is still a faith that overcomes the world, the one unanswerable thing about genuine Christians is their greater inward security and their profounder spiritual joy.

Now have you and I found that great security in Christ, and that profound spiritual joy, and that adventure to which He admits those who make His way their own? It is no more use for us to criticise the church in general than to criticise the world in general. Who is the church if not you and I? Why is our Christianity unconvincing? Why has the salt of our lives lost its savor and become insipid? I want to try to give you some reasons for it, and then if possible some remedies.

First, most of us have never seen the kind of challenging individual Christian that makes us feel that he has found a universally workable way of living. We have all seen good people, most of us have seen a saint or two: but for all our admiration, they seem detached and different; and we could not climb on board the thing they had nor make it our own. Either they or their circumstances seemed utterly unlike ourselves and our circumstances. Sermons and good religious ideas do not provide the thing that I mean. Religious leaders do not always provide it, unless they are very close to the needs and situations of ordinary men and women. Through this lack, many of us have come to look upon true religious experience as something to be sought but never quite to be found. We settle down into spiritual mediocrity and half-converted living.

Second, a great many of us have never made a decisive start in the Christian life. We were baptized and confirmed, perhaps; but let us be frank, we were never converted. Perhaps in our pride we said that we were brought up in the Episcopal Church and did not need to be converted. I quote to you from a letter of the great Roman Catholic, Baron Von Hugel, to his nieces: "After all every soul, boy or girl, as they grow up, have to pass through that delicate difficult crisis, when they themselves have deliberately to will the right and God. Even when the training and example have been perfect, and when the natural character is specially good." Have you ever been through that "delicate difficult crisis", where you gave yourself entirely to God, preferably in the presence of another human soul as your witness? I could tell you dozens of stories of conventional church-members, men and women, whom I have seen go at long last through that crisis; and watched them come into a whole new life of joy and power when they had done it.

Third, though we may have made a beginning with Christ, many of us have never gone back and cleared up our own past, so that we started with a clean slate. I know that there are heaps of men and women who can never find and keep a true experience of Christ unless they dig back into their own history and make right with others the things which have been wrong. Some time ago a woman began coming down to my church: she was nervous and terribly self-conscious. She kept coming to church, and she did not seem to make much progress. This past summer she went to her daughter and her daughter-in-law, with neither of whom she could get along, and she made a clean breast of her own wrongs in the relationship with them. Not only did it restore their relationship, but it let the power of God into this woman's life, so that she got release and freedom from herself. Many of us here today will never get any further with God until we make right an old grudge, a resentment, an unforgiving attitude, or perhaps restore something that does not belong to us. We like to say that this belongs to the distant past; but what is still a factor in your present consciousness, belongs to your present. I almost never talk to any one about finding Christ that there is not something of this sort to be cleared.

Fourth, many of us carry about with us something on our minds which we have not trusted to God. It is often a fear: fear of illness, fear of poverty, fear of old age, fear of competition, and of the loss of friends. We hate it, but we cling to it. We may be worried about somebody, our friend, our sister, our child—they may be sick, or they may be in spiritual danger: and instead of trusting them to God, having done what we could, and leaving them to Him in prayer, we fuss in our souls about them, worry, and consecrate our worry by saying to ourselves that we ought to worry. We ought never to worry. To be concerned is one thing, to fret is another. Jesus never worried where He could not help directly. There is, I am convinced, an area of unentrusted territory in the inner life of many a Christian. And Christians who do not trust on the inside are insipid always on the outside. The robust faith that "all things work together for good to them that love God" is the surest mark of a believing Christian, and it is the strongest weapon we have against the unbelief of the world.

Fifth, how many of us know the gladness and the liberty of sharing a genuine experience of Christ with others? The first-century Christians were marked by contagious enthusiasm. Something perfectly tremendous had happened to them. They were frankly excited about Jesus Christ. Are you? When you see a couple on the verge of divorce, can you help Him to come into the situation and clear the air? When you find a woman worried to death by fears and self-pity, can you bring Christ into the picture, who alone can change it? When a man asks you for a quarter on the street, can you give him something more than a piece of small change? When you meet spiritual indifference and unbelief, have you in your possession so radiant, so enthusiastic, so contagious and joyous an experience of Christ that you can meet it, not with argument so much, but with an obvious possession which is its own argument? Until we are far enough along to talk with people naturally about Christ, we are still self-conscious Christians. And they are usually insipid Christians.

Sixth, we need the fellowship of other Christians who will hold us to the very highest, and challenge us to keep moving in the spiritual life. Let us be honest, most of our clergy and fellow-workers in the church are so busy encouraging us that they often say things to us which are not true, and which let us down by leaving us contentedly where we are. Many is the time that I have heard some one speak of their dissatisfaction with their religious life to another Christian: and heard that Christian reply, "Oh, but I have always admired you so much. You haven't anything to worry about. I wish I were as good as you!" Far better to sit down with them in genuine honesty and let them tell you where they feel their religious life is defective, help them to get off their minds the particular thing that is worrying them, and if possible bring them to a complete consecration of themselves to Christ. A lot of us might be described in a phrase of Giles Randall, writing way back in the seventeenth century, "Poor souls after many years travelling being found in the same place and going at the same pace." Isn't that a terribly accurate description of many of us Episcopalians, "After many years travelling being found in the same place and going at the same pace?" And doesn't it come from being taken for granted by our spiritual leaders and associates?

How in the world are we going to stir out of the spiritual lethargy and dullness which holds us? Wherewith can the salt be made salt again?

There has got to be born a profound conviction that the Church can never move the world traveling at its present rate, and living at its present level. No amount of analyzing the situation in long reports, no amount of pointing to our fine churches, or looking on the bright side of things will do. We are in a desperately serious situation. Blind optimism and stupid complacency will drive the world yet farther from us. We need to look down deep into the poverty of our own souls, and realize that the great need lies right there. We are setting about frantic and atheistic financial drives to support our institutions, we have retrenched our missionary enterprises, our spiritual leaders are driven to death with executive and financial obligations, because there is not enough religion in the church. Going as we are going, I think there will be no more religion generated than we have had. We need to repent of a great many of our present church-methods as we repent of our sins, for at heart they ape the world and distrust God. There has got to come a radical conviction in the church that we must turn our attention in a different direction if our present administrative and financial worries are not to grow worse and finally swamp us altogether. Unmet financial needs are but a symptom of our anaemic spiritual condition. The most disturbing thing about the church today is the condition of our own souls. We have no spiritual possession with which to compel the attention and the allegiance of the world.

If you ask me the way out, I say frankly, convert the Christians. I mean by conversion, at its beginning, a perfectly definite experience which is open to us all through the gateway of personal surrender to the Lord Jesus Christ. I believe this spreads into countless applications, but that the heart of it has been lost if the life is not forever marked by being centered in God and His Kingdom in the world, by peace that is not ruffled by trouble, by strength in the hour of temptation, by enthusiasm for Jesus Christ, by sensitiveness to the motions of the Holy Spirit, and by the power to bring about conversion in the lives of others. I believe that those of you who are living outside of that experience are living below par. Show me a period in the church's life, from apostolic times downward, that has been marked by true conversion of individual souls to Christ, church-members as well as outsiders, and I will show you a period when the salt got back its savor. Many say to me that all this personal religion leaves out the social implications of the Gospel. It shouldn't, and it is defective and incomplete if it does. But in my judgment we have been asking people to apply in racial, political, industrial and international matters the Spirit of Christ before we were sure they knew that Spirit in their own homes and their own souls. You can't apply what you haven't got! The need of the Social Gospel, like the need of the Church at large, is for an enrichment of its own inner life and a deeper understanding of the meaning of our whole Christian enterprise.

We need to be converted. We need a horde of surrendered Christians turned loose within this church of ours. If we have given our lives to Christ without reserve, we shall be concerned for the spread of His Kingdom though the world. We shall know in ourselves that the counterpart of enthusiastic missions amongst foreign peoples is enthusiastic personal evangelism and witness amongst our friends at home, who need it just as much—and that none of us has really found Jesus Christ who is not a missionary for Him. If every man and woman in this cathedral were doing what they ought to be doing, they would be winning lives one by one for Jesus Christ. They would get some salt back into the insipid church! The deepest reason why you do not do it is the same reason that kept me from doing it for years, not the fear nor the reticence which we allege, but our poverty of spiritual experience, our want of caring enough to learn how, our not having been held up to it by our ministers. I am not asking you to do anything which is not now being done by lay-people right here in the City of New York, and I can take you to see them if you want to know how they do it.

Let the Church begin to pray for revival, not in China or Africa alone, but right in its own lethargic midst! Let the Holy Spirit begin again to fall upon us and capture us and change us and liberate us! Let us begin to be as vocal about Christ and His Church as we are about our common human enthusiasms! And the Church will once again be convincing, it will commend its Gospel to an indifferent world without because it will have transformed its own world within, and it will win back the savor which belongs to it by its birthright. For the salt and savor of the Church is its consecration to our Lord.

THIRTY YEARS OF THE CHRISTMAS SPIRIT.

The Children's Home Society of Virginia Greets Its Friends.

Christmas marks an event in the life of the Children's Home Society of Virginia this year, for the organization is rounding out three decades of continuous service to the dependent children of the Commonwealth.

Thirty years ago it entered the field as a pioneer in child welfare work and today it stands the only organization of the kind to which the dependent white children in Virginia's one hundred counties can turn for succor. Through the generous support of Virginia people, we have been able to care for more than 4,000 boys and girls, many of whom are now useful citizens of the Commonwealth, and the present year finds us with more than 1,000 children as our wards.

This will be the happiest Christmas in the history of the Children's Home Society, for much has been accomplished during the past twelve months, and we face the New Year practically reorganized on a basis that will enable us to render a far more efficient service than ever before. This is our Christmas present to the people of Virginia, and perhaps the very best part of it is that our reorganization brings us closer not only to the children, but to the men and women in each Virginia county who from now on will have a direct contact with the society and an actual part in planning for and caring for the little ones who come under our wing.

So, in a happier holiday spirit than ever we are planning a real Christmas party at the Receiving Home in Richmond, where some seventy boys and girls are comfortably housed. The society extends to each and every one of its many friends who have helped us in the past, and to all to whom the welfare and happiness of little children is dear, a warm invitation to be with us at least in spirit at our Christmas party. Whatever you may wish to share of your abundance with them will be most gratefully received.

To the thousands who have helped us in the past to care for the homeless, to give to them the opportunity to which every child is entitled; a chance to grow up to be useful men and women, the Children's Home Society extends the greetings of the season.

Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year! May we work together hand in hand in the years to come in the greatest service of all, the service to homeless children.

RING IN HEALTH!

By Elizabeth Cole.

In the olden days any one could be a bell ringer. Sometimes a citizen had to pay for the privilege and if a man abused the honor he had to pay a fine. In All Saints' Church at Hastings these words were written:

"This is a belfry that is free
For all those that civil be,
And if you please to chime or ring
It is a very pleasant thing."

All through history from the sixteenth century, which was the golden age of bells, chimes have called out to people their cheerful messages—usually telling a story. For example, when the old year was departing the bells would be tolled in sadness for the dying year—then when twelve o'clock had struck the merry peals shouted forth their welcome to the new year.

And it is interesting to realize that the cup given for prizes in sports or deeds of bravery is in reality a bell inverted. Truly the bell has always been a happy symbol and bell ringing suggests picturesque tales of all times.

It seems fitting that on the gay little Christmas seal for 1929 a bell ringer should be portrayed. He is tugging at the heavy bell, ringing in health, a joy in living, for the new year.

Each year the seal is decorative and brings its message of health at the Christmas season to remind people that sickness can be prevented. So well known have these stamps become, indeed, that it is interesting to realize they originated in a small way only twenty-two years ago. In 1907, the first seals were sold in this country to help build a tuberculosis pavilion in the State of Delaware. Miss Emily P. Bissell had read about a postal clerk in Denmark, whose idea of decorating Christmas mail with the stamps to secure money for a children's hospital in Copenhagen, appealed to her. Through her efforts the sum of $3,000 was raised that first year. From a small beginning then the seal sales have grown and flourished every year until today this cheerful method of raising money is an annual event without which the Christmas season would not be complete.

Thanks to this tiny Christmas seal, state after state has been organized to attack tuberculosis with a scientific program. Together, led by the national body, they have brought into existence nearly all of the present-day community machinery that combats this disease. Money raised by the Christmas seal is not sufficient to build and conduct hospitals, clinics, open-air schools and other necessary measures, so the tuberculosis association's program consists largely of preventive work and of arousing public opinion to the need for institutions that can be maintained by official agencies, state, county, municipal, or federal. The Christmas seal campaign is an intensive educational campaign which has helped to bring about the passing and enforcement of health laws; the placing of tuberculosis specialists and nurses in many communities; the circulating of printed matter on disease prevention in schools, homes, and factories. An active public interest in tuberculosis control has been instigated among civic, political, commercial, social, and religious groups.

The funds raised from the annual seal sales have always been used in the communities where the seals were purchased. Only five per cent is contributed to the National Tuberculosis Association which acts as a clearing house, or in other words, as the hub in the big wheel of coordinated health work. In this way a feeling of personal and proprietary interest is created in those who support the sales.

And this support is stupendous. Advertising agencies, motion picture theatres, editors, publishers, women's clubs, business men's clubs, parent-teacher associations, labor unions and lodges have given such generous cooperation to the national and local tuberculosis associations that without their help the programs could never be so successfully carried through.

Indeed that loyal help given by rich and poor, children and grown-ups, individuals and groups is of more permanent benefit than the money itself. For it means that all people have been made aware of the fact that sickness prevention is possible—that health is purchasable. The educational value of the seal is inestimable.

This year again the seal carries its message of health throughout the country. Every one in December has a chance to be a bell ringer as in the olden days. "Ring in a year of health with the merry Christmas seal" is the story that goes out into the world on millions of letters and packages this joyous Christmas season.

BIBLE QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

(Our readers are invited to send in their questions from time to time concerning Scriptural subjects in which they are perplexed or desire light. Our limited space necessitates brevity in questions, as well as in the answers which we will endeavor to maintain in strict accord with the Word of the Lord, which, after all, settles all argument. This column is therefore not for controversy, but for a testimony.)

Question 1—What do Bible teachers have in mind when they speak of Daniel's seventieth week in chapter 9:24.—R. F. W., Palmyra, Pa.

Answer—The parenthetical period (thought to cover years) between this Church Age and the Millennium, during which time the Anti-Christ (Satan incarnate) reigns on the earth. For further information see Clarence Larkin's very helpful book, "Daniel", sold by E. Sanders, 1930 South Logan Square, Philadelphia, Pa.

Question 2—Was the prize mentioned in Phil. 3:14 eternal life?—E. V.

Answer—The prize Paul was seeking was not salvation. That he always had (1 Cor. 1:10; 2 Tim. 1:9; Heb. 7:25, etc.). The prize he is striving for is the reward spoken of in Rev. 22:12, and 11:18.

THE UNIVERSAL PRAYER. By Rev. James Sheerin. Cloth; pp. 126. Published by Skeffington & Son, Ltd. London, England. Price 2/6 net.

With the changing religious ideals and the demand for the simplicity of the presentation of Christian truth, there is always need for a fresh exegesis of this memorable expression of faith. Dr. Sheerin has done a good work in a small compass and produced a thought-provoking contribution to the literature of the day.

There is a pungency of suggestion in his way of putting things and a heartfelt revelation of his own conviction of the deeply spiritual value of this form of petition early adopted by the Church as the pattern of prayer.

His plea, "Living as if prayer were as much a part of life as any other act, is to live the prayer life. There comes a time in the life of good people when this mood is constant and without observation. It becomes a normal and unconscious habit. Prayer for success in business, or in work of any sort, is not necessarily materialistic or selfish. The praying man works better and fights better. He understands his work better," is deeply felt by every one who knows the life of prayer. And he enjoins that the Lord's Prayer is a communistic prayer, for "it is always primarily social. It teaches us not to pray for ourselves alone, but for others".

We may be allowed to question two perspectives of truth which he treats confidently. He has no sympathy with the return of our Lord to reign on earth; he utterly rejects the New Testament doctrines of the personality of Satan. His work would have not been the less persuasive had he omitted these objections to the historic faith of the Church, embalmed in its liturgy. But that will not impel us to reject the rest of his admirable treatise.

INDUSTRIALIZATION OF THE SOUTH—PAST AND PRESENT. A PRESENTATION OF THE SOUTH BEFORE THE INSTITUTE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA, AUGUST 10, 1929. By Richard H. Edmonds, Editor, Manufacturers' Record, Baltimore.

All Southerners owe a debt of gratitude to Richard H. Edmonds, editor of the Manufacturers' Record, for his able presentation of facts regarding the Industrialization of the South, Past and Present.

We owe it to him that the world will become familiar with the marvelous development of the South in recent years; and we are glad to know what a substantial basis we have for our faith in its future.

The report is both interesting and instructive; and as such we commend it to all who are interested in the industrial development of the South.

TURNING POINTS OF GENERAL CHURCH HISTORY. By Edward L. Cutts, D. D. Condensed and revised by William C. Piercy, M. A. Cloth; pp. 323. Published by the Macmillan Co., New York City. Price, $2.25.

This volume, first issued in 1877, comes now to us in an improved form. Mr. Piercy has done a good work in bringing it up to date and so reducing the subject matter as to allure the busy man who finds the reading of Church History an unattractive pursuit.

Certainly most of folks are lamentably informed on this matter. And yet no theme, apart from the study of the Word of God, is so essential to a balanced comprehension of the design and status of Christianity as Church History. It is fascinating, informative and stimulating.

Here is a volume which gathers the main points of that engrossing sphere of students a clustering of events and personalities which gives to the reader a clear retrospect of the most vital record ever written of the doings of mankind. The occupied man in the affairs of life can read one chapter a day and in time become possessed of a knowledge that will surprise him; and conversely qualify him to hold discussion on the matter intelligently and persuasively.

Originally published under the auspices of the Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge, it has the charm of simplicity and directness which appeals to popular needs. A very excellent table of contents, as good as an index, supplements the latter which lies at the close of the volume for reference. Among the attractive chapters are "The World Prepared for the Church", "The Apostolic Church", "The Sketch of the Roman Empire to the Conversion of Constantine", "The Worship of the Primitive Church", "Monasticism", "The Mohammedan Conquests", "The Crusades", "Medieval Developments" and "The Reformation". There are forty chapters in all, some taking only four to twenty pages. Therefore, the book will be easy to cover, a little a day, in one month. There is nothing better in its line that we know. And it is sincerely commended. For once its facts are in some degree assimilated, the reader will press towards the larger contributions in this field of study with genuine zest.

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letters to the Editor" will appear in our columns except those coming to us signed by writer.

SUGGESTS ELECTRIC LIGHT.

Mr. Editor:

The writer suggests that the name of Jesus be placed, in letters of electric light, high up, on the four sides of the steeples of all Christian churches, so that those in sickness or in health who look may be reminded that there is one who said:

"As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up."

"That whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have eternal life."

"And the Lord said unto Moses, make thee a fiery serpent and set it upon a pole; and it shall come to pass, that every one that is bitten, when he looketh upon it, shall live."

"Look unto me and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth: for I am God and there is none else."

"There is no god else beside me: a just God and a Saviour; and there is none beside me."

"And the Spirit and the Bride say, Come. And let him that heareth say, Come. And let him that is athirst come. And, whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely."

"And him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out."

As dance halls and other such places use electric light to light the way to the under world, shall Christian churches not use electric light to light the Way to Heaven?

CHURCH AND POLITICS.

Mr. Editor:

I am a subscriber to your most excellent journal, the Southern Churchman, and have read with satisfaction your article entitled "Radicals", in the issue of September 14, 1929. Shortly before that date, in conversation with the dean of one of our cathedrals, touching the efforts of our Massachusetts committee in presenting a resolution to the General Convention, asking that the Episcopal Church be kept out of politics, he said, despairingly, "But we have not a Church paper with us". I at once recalled a pleasant correspondence with Mr. Alfred B. Williams, after the General Convention, when I mailed a copy of our statement to him, and in his reply he said: "For one, I hope very earnestly your organization will continue, and think you have every reason to congratulate yourselves on success. So long as there are organizations of busy, grievously mistaken people trying to take our Church into politics, they must be met with counter organizations—at least to prevent mischief."

It is interesting to have received from Bishop Gailor almost these exact words.

We have not forgotten your kind interest shown by publishing in your paper our resolution, and thereby gathering signatures for us. I might mention here that I have personally had interviews with thirty-five of the bishops and clergy, all in sympathy with our point of view.

I will enclose a copy of our statement, which will refresh your memory as to what was done by us at the General Convention, and where we officially stopped. The blanket expression, "Keep the Church out of politics", covers the difficult situation created by all subversive movements under alleged religious sanction. If we can prevent our National Council getting the Episcopal Church wholly in the Federal Council of Churches at the next General Convention, enough will have been done to save the situation. This should be aimed at the next two years through an accurate, dispassionate statement of facts.

The recent events at our cathedral reveal the indisputable fact that such groups as the C. L. I. D. and Fellowship of Reconciliation are organizations working continuously on lines inimical to Church and government.

I am taking the liberty of sending you to read the latest from my friend, the Rev. Prebendary Gough, who has done valiant work exposing Christian Socialism in England.

We have called our committee together and formulated plans for continued work.

BIBLES.

Mr. Editor:

It may be of interest to you and your many readers that St. James' Chapter of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew of Richmond, Va., some years ago inaugurated a movement and the same was adopted by the Bible Society of America, as follows (American Bible Society): St. James' Chapter sends through the Bible Society one Holy Bible to some family every Sunday during the year, or fifty-two Bibles each year, and has done so for many years. Any one who would like to get in touch with the Bible Society can do so right here in Richmond.. It was St. James' Chapter that wrote the American Bible Society, asking what it would cost to send a Holy Bible daily, weekly or monthly. The Bible Society has our record, and we are very proud and happy to have thought of this then.

PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL.

Mr. Editor:

I am an old woman. I am Protestant Episcopal and hope your fight will win the privilege for the next generation to remain Protestant Episcopal with all the words imply.

AN EXTRA GIFT ON CHRIST'S BIRTHDAY.

Mr. Editor:

I feel like making an offering to missions, an extra, since reading the message of Bishop Anderson on the front page of the Southern Churchman.

Please send it where it will do good. If we all might make a little extra gift on His birthday to those who leave home and country to carry His gospel to all the world, as He commanded!

I feel profoundly grateful for our new Bishop, also for the splendid place you gave his appeal on the front page of your paper. God bless him in his work! And God bless you.

Hope.

Editor's Note: A cheque for fifty dollars enclosed in the above letter has been forwarded to Archdeacon Neve to help make up a deficiency in appropriations for Mountain Missions.

Church Intelligence

Evangelist.

Dr. Larkin W. Glazebrook, lay evangelist, on a preaching tour through our western dioceses, takes time from his busy day to send us his itinerary and the following copy of his report to Bishop Walter Mitchell of his recent visitation to the Missionary District of Arizona. He writes:

"This is a great country. Our Church is doing a great work in this far western country under splendid leadership."

The Report.

I arrived at Williams the afternoon of November 5 and was met by one of your splendid laymen, Mr. Stevenson, who motored my family around this interesting neighborhood until time for my train to leave for the Canyon.

On the evening of November 6 I returned to Williams, and after sending my family on to Los Angeles went to the residence of Mr. Stevenson, where I was most cordially entertained during my stay at Williams.

The afternoon of the seventh I met in the parish hall with the Woman's Auxiliary of that region and was privileged to address twenty-five women and a dozen men. At 7 P. M. there was a special supper conference, of which the entire time was given to me. There were about seventy-five persons present who had come from many points within a hundred miles of Williams. Bishop Mitchell came all the way to Williams to welcome me and introduce me. It was a very happy beginning to my work in this Diocese.

I took the midnight train to Phoenix, arriving there the next morning at 7 A. M., and was met by Dean E. S. Lane, of Trinity Cathedral.

On Sunday morning, November 10, I attended the early service at the cathedral, and was then privileged to go through the different grades of this Sunday school. I found fifty children in the primary department, seventy-five in the kindergarten, and about three hundred of the upper grades met in the cathedral church, where, with their own choir and lay reader, I enjoyed their short service and was privileged to speak to them. At the 11 o'clock service I spoke to a congregation of four hundred and fifty outstanding men and women. During the afternoon I visited the Government Indian School, where I was greatly interested in seeing the eight hundred young people assembled there.

Monday, Armistice Day, being a holiday, no appointments could be arranged, but I was privileged to see the many who had come to this city of 75,000 people, and in the afternoon visited St. John's Mission, where I saw assembled another group of some three hundred boys and girls of the Apache and Pina tribes. In the evening at 7 o'clock I was invited to be the honored guest at a banquet given at the Country Club by the members of my fraternity (A. T. O.).

On November 12, in company with the Rev. Charles A. Dowdell, I visited St. Luke's Home for Tubercular Patients under the splendid direction of the Rev. Bertrand R. Cocks. I went to the beds of the thirty-five patients there, and after a pleasant chat with each presented one of my cards entitled "Jesus" to each of them. At 2:30 P. M. I met with the regional group of the Woman's Auxiliary and spoke to some sixty that were present. There were four clergy from places outside of the city present. At 6:30 P. M. a men's dinner conference had been arranged at the cathedral parish house. There I spoke to sixty laymen and twelve clergy.

November 13 I left Phoenix at 6:45 A. M., en route for Bisbee. Arriving at the Junction, I was met by my old friend from Richmond, Va., the Rev. William Cox, who motored me to the hotel at Bisbee. At 2:30 P. M. I addressed another regional group of the Woman's Auxiliary, with about thirty-five splendid women in attendance. At 8 P. M., at the Y. M. C. A., I spoke to a group of forty men. Twenty-five of these men came with their rector, the Baptist pastor, the rector of the Presbyterian church was also present.

November 14, after early communion, Mr. Cox drove me to Douglas. The rector of the parish, Mr. Simonson, met me and took me to the meeting of the Kiwanis Club, where I spoke to a group of eighty outstanding men. After this my brother's brother-in-law, Mr. Robinson, took me through the great smelters located there, and later in the afternoon Mr. Simonson took me across the border, where I was privileged to set foot on the Mexican soil and see the quaint town located there, where a detachment of Mexican Cavalry had just come in. That evening at 7:30 I spoke to a congregation of seventy-five people. After this service the Rev. and Mrs. H. B. Moore motored me to their home at Tombstone. It was a remarkable drive, a beautiful moonlight night. When we reached the Continental Divide, an elevation of 6,000 feet, we stopped and viewed the great surrounding country. The next morning my kind friends motored me to Tumson, where we arrived about 12 noon, and were greeted by the rector, the Rev. E. C. Tuthill. Arrangements had been made that I should lunch with the Rev. Mr. Huntington at St. Luke's Sanitarium in the desert, where I again was privileged to talk individually with the twenty-five young men. One of these men was a friend of mine whom I had known in Washington. To each of them I handed one of the little cards called "Jesus". Immediately after this visit a group of young men from the University of Arizona who are interested in the formation of a chapter of my fraternity, motored me through the grounds of the University, and at their house I met the other men of the group. The Rev. Mr. Huntington then took me to the new veterans' hospital, where I called upon a young man from Richmond, Va., who is very ill at the hospital, and was privileged to see this modern plant. At 7:30 I spoke at our church there to about one hundred who were present. I then took the 8:45 train for Los Angeles.

During my interesting stay in this remarkable country I was privileged to meet the Bishop, his Archdeacon and every clergyman of the Diocese except the rector of one parish. I have rarely ever seen a finer body of men, certainly none more loyal to their Bishop and the Church. All enthusiastic in their parochial work and many of them working in the desert and in remote places.

I also feel that the Bishop was very wise in calling three regional meetings of his Diocesan Woman's Auxiliary groups, at points where I was to be. These I feel added greatly to my opportunity to reach to every point of the Diocese.

I take the liberty of suggesting, especially to the clergy whom I was in close touch with, that they stress our great program of evangelism and personal work for Christ by individual laymen and women during the coming year, and hope that the Bishop may, in his next Diocesan publication, urge upon all of his people the advantage of every man and woman carrying forward the message which I was privileged to bring as the lay worker of the National Commission on Evangelism.

Dr. Glazebrook's itinerary follows:

November 6-30—Diocese of Los Angeles.

December 1-7—Diocese of San Joaquin.

December 8-15—Diocese of California.

December 16-January4—Vacation period.

January 5-12—Diocese of Sacramento.

January 15-25—Diocese of Eastern Oregon.

January 26-February 5—Diocese of Oregon.

February 7-15—Diocese of Olympia.

February 16-30—Diocese of Spokane.

New Dean for DuBose School.

DuBose Memorial Church Training School, Monteagle, Tenn., is to have a new dean in the person of the Rev. Albert G. Richards, D. D., rector of Emmanuel Church, Athens, Ga. The first dean of the school, the Rev. Mercer P. Logan, D. D., died a year ago, since then the school has been in charge of the faculty. Dr. Richards is an alumnus of Hobart College and of the General Seminary, and has had notably successful pastorates in Lake Forest, Ill., Mobile, Ala., and Athens, Ga. He is chairman of the Board of Examining Chaplains of the Diocese of Atlanta. He will assume charge of the school about February 1. DuBose School invites its friends to rejoice with it in its good fortune.

Bishop Tucker Better.

The Rt. Rev. Beverly D. Tucker, D. D., Bishop of Southern Virginia, who for the last month has been seriously ill in the Sarah Leigh Hospital in Norfolk, Va., as result of a fall, is showing much improvement.

"The Bishop is getting along splendidly," was the report of Dr. James H. Culpepper, who is attending the Bishop.

Dr. Culpepper stated that Bishop Tucker would probably be able to go home the first part of this week.

Constructive Program Adopted by Rural Church Conference Board.

At a meeting in Richmond November 27 the Executive Committee of the Virginia Rural Church Conference Board voted to undertake the following projects for the year 1930. (1) The holding of a rural church leader's conference in Richmond about February 1; (2) the sponsoring of a Rural Church Day during the month of May; and (3) the conducting of a ten-day interdenominational rural pastor's school at Virginia Polytechnic Institute the latter part of July. It is expected that funds will be raised for a number of scholarships to this pastor's school.

The Rural Church Conference Board is an outgrowth of the Rural Church Survey Committee which has functioned for the last three years, and which sponsored a comprehensive study of the rural church situation in Virginia. This study was made by C. H. Hamilton and W. E. Garnett, of the Rural Sociology Division of the Virginia Agricultural Experiment Station, working under the direction of a committee of church leaders. The results of this study were recently published as a 200-page bulletin by the Virginia Agricultural Experiment Station under the title, "The Role of the Church in Rural Community Life in Virginia". This bulletin can be had for the asking by addressing a card to the Rural Sociology Division, Virginia Agricultural Experiment Station, Blacksburg, Va. The bulletin discusses the subject in a comprehensive way. It concludes with a well-formulated constructive program prepared by a committee of well-known church leaders who had reviewed the bulletin manuscript. This committee was headed by Dr. Rolvix Harlan, of the University of Richmond.

The meeting of leaders in February and the Rural Church Day in May are expected to focus on the findings of this bulletin.

The Executive Committee of the Rural Church Conference Board is composed of the following: Dr. William Archer Wright, of the M. E. Home Mission Board, chairman; Dr. Minor C. Miller, Virginia Council of Religious Education, vice-chairman; Professor B. L. Hummel, of V. P. I. Agricultural Extension Service, secretary; Dr. George T. Waite, chairman of the Executive Committee of the Baptist Home Mission Board; Dr. H. W. McLaughlin, director of Presbyterian rural church work; Dr. J. J. Scherer, President of Lutheran Synod of Virginia, Richmond; Dr. John H. Tate, of the Home Mission Board of the Disciples of Christ; Dr. F. D. Goodwin, of the Virginia Diocese Social Service Committee, Warsaw; Dr. Rolvix Harlan, of the University of Richmond;; Dr. Wilson Gee, of the University of Virginia; Dr. William E. Garnett, of the Virginia Polytechnic Institute; and Dr. A. L. Maiden, President of Dayton College.

A Stupendous Task Completed.

The New Testament has been translated into the Cakchiquel Indian language of Guatemala by Mr. and Mrs. W. Cameron Townsend, and has been sent to New York for publication by the American Bible Society.

This sounds like a magnificent accomplishment by these two people with their two Indian helpers, Trinidad Bac and Joe Chicol, in nine years of arduous labor. But the magnitude of the task is not nearly expressed by the above statement, for the dialect of the Cakchiquel Indians is a language which hitherto had never even appeared in written form. So before a translation could be made an entire language had to be put in written form for the first time and over 2,000 verbal forms classified.

Commenting on his work, Mr. Townsend said:

"The Indians will be surprised to see a piece of paper talk to them in their own language, which never before has been reduced to writing for any practical purposes. Our New Testament is to be made up in parallel columns. One column will contain the Spanish version; the other column will contain the Cakchiquel rendering. Thus we have the translation serving as a dictionary."

Because of the government's desire to discourage the dialects of the tribal Indians, the missionaries have Spanish as their ultimate aim for an accepted Guatemalan language. Five per cent of the Cakchiquel men now read Spanish. For this reason Townsend expressed his belief that only two or three lessons will be necessary to teach those Indians how to read the translation.

In this manner the Cakchiquel translation will serve the double purpose of teaching the Gospel to the Indians and spreading the Spanish language. The last effect will be to destroy the Cakchiquel tongue, which the Townsends have reduced to writing, but, though their work is perishable, the missionaries feel that its present value in the spread of Christianity will be well worth the long hours they have devoted during the last nine years to the translation.

Mrs. Townsend has written that this task of translating was particularly hard because so many words of ours are not even in the Indians' language—such as love. They hardly knew at first how to explain it to the minds of these people, but she says that now some of them have seen the light and understand the love of God.

Mr. Townsend is a native of Santa Ana, Cal., and for the last year he and Mrs. Townsend with their Indian helpers have been there at work on the translation. On October 10 a great public service in the First Presbyterian Church of Santa Ana fittingly celebrated the completion of the stupendous task. A part of the service was the writing of the last two words of the manuscript by Mr. Townsend's father and mother.

Mr. and Mrs. Townsend are missionaries under the Central American Mission. Together they will read proof on the Holy Testament translation and then return to the mission fields at Guatemala.

This mission was founded by the late C. I. Scofield, D. D. (author of the invaluable helps incorporated in the Scofield Bible) in 1890 on evangelical, evangelistic and undenominational lines with the avowed purpose of preaching the Gospel to every creature in Central America.

Southern History Available.

The following circular letter contains information which should prove interesting to many of our readers:

"The Maples,"

Upperville, Va., Nov. 25, 1929.

Our committee is sending out to a select number of clergymen in our Southern churches—two addresses that are receiving high praise from leading churchmen and are being reviewed in Southern papers, both secular and religious—i. e., a brochure on Robert E. Lee, by Dr. Landon C. Bell, and the address delivered before the Charlotte U. C. V. Reunion by the Commander-in-Chief of the Confederate Veterans, General A. T. Goodwyn.

We are sending these addresses to you, under separate cover, with one of these reviews by Dr. S. A. Steel, of the M. E. Church, South, that was published in the October 6 issue of the Memphis Commercial Appeal.

We believe that these addresses will prove of interest to you and bespeak for them a careful reading, and we would appreciate it if you would pass them around among your friends, and to this extent cooperate with the work our committee is doing to make the history of the War Between the States period something other than "a fable agreed upon".

Any cooperation you may see fit to give us will be much appreciated.

Faithfully yours,

VIRGINIA HISTORY COMMITTEE.

N. B.—General Goodwyn's address has been carried as a serial in the Southern Churchman, Richmond, Va. This shows what the editorial staff of this paper thinks of this masterly treatise.

I am also enclosing a Confederate Catechism by L. G. Tyler, President-Emeritus College of William and Mary, and two folders of books we are placing in the schools.

It may interest you to know that Rev. Giles B. Cooke, last surviving officer on Lee's staff, now in his ninetieth year, is cooperating with us in this work. Should you wish to drop him a line, his address is Mathews Court House, Va.

Antique Stone Presented Western Theological Seminary.

An ancient stone known as the "Gloucester Stone" has recently been presented to the Western Theological Seminary, and has been placed in a niche opposite the main entrance of the Horlick refectory tower.

This stone was brought from England about twenty years ago by William Horlick, the donor of the refectory.

It is a tapered fluted stone standing about nineteen inches high, nine inches across the top, eleven and a half at the base.

It was dug up half a century ago outside Gloucester Cathedral and in front of the fourteenth century Church of St. Mary de Lode. It had lain in the earth for no one knew how long, and the surface was badly pitted on one side.

As St. Mary de Lode is on the site of a Roman temple which became the first Christian church in Britain, it was for some time thought that possibly the strange stone was a relic from this temple. It was also suggested that it might be a Druid remain.

Recently, however, when Mr. Horlick decided to donate the stone to the seminary careful research was made concerning its origin. It was learned that, whereas the modern Church of St. Mary de Lode has no spire, but is square, with four turrelles at the corners and a parapet between, in former days it had a spire.

Further research disclosed the fact that this stone spire had been battered down by Cromwell's army during the Civil War. Putting these facts together, the inference lay close at hand that this stone was the topmost stone of the old spire of St. Mary de Lode, that above it stood the cross, and that the pittings on one side were the marks of bullets.

The "Northfield" Testament.

The pocket edition of the New Testament printed in beautifully clear type by the Association Press and distributed through the Northfield League of the Young Women's Conference, East Northfield, Mass., has been so helpfully arranged that one seeing it feels that the good news of it must be passed on for others to share.

The aim of its editors is that the little Testament be distributed on the basis of friendship, and on the first page is written, "Every day when we read this Testament let us pray for one another. Friendship develops through prayer."

There are several inspirational verses on the first and last pages, but most important are the helps towards the greater appreciation of God's Word; how to approach the Bible, what to read on special occasions, familiar selections whose place in the Bible should be known, special Bible verses as guides to the conduct of life, how to pray. Possibly finest of all is a tiny pencil attached on a pretty red cord, for truly that which brings the Book closest is the particular appeal it makes to the individual. As it appeals to and works in the reader's life it fulfills its greatest purpose. So often immediately writing down a thought or making a particular verse impresses a lesson on one's mind which might have untold effect on one's life, and which otherwise might be completely forgotten. The pencil is suggestive. The Bible is not just a book to be read. It is destined to arouse a definite response in the reader.

Covered in a pretty dull red cloth, the little Testament would be a beautiful Christmas gift, carrying with it the real Christmas season message of friendship and good-will.

Copies may be obtained for fifty cents. Address orders and make checks payable to Miss Anna Grandin, Treasurer, 11 Elm Street, Tidioute, Pa.

Tribute to a Choir.

On the occasion of the forty-third anniversary of St. Peter's Church, Norfolk, Va., the following verses were tendered as a tribute to the choir and were read to the members by Dean Peacock at the close of Evensong, November 17:

To the Choristers.

St. Peter's P. E. Church, Norfolk, Va.

By George Frederic Viett.

'Tis not Rome's proud and pompous shrine
We sing, but of this fane of thine,
That rears its modest cross above
A band of brethren—In His Love.

This well loved little church of ours,
Whose calendar of holy hours
Her watchers keep throughout the years
To sanctify our joys and tears.

Sweet singers of this simple shrine!
Oft have ye hymned a chord divine
That lifted quiet meditation
To heights of holy exaltation.

We love to list the litanies,
The anthems, chants, antiphonies,
That oft from out this chancel place
Have filled our hearts with saintly grace.

As when at Evensong we've knelt
With choir, in prayer and chant, and felt
The spell of song's blest ministry
Unite us with Divinity.

For music pleads with magic tongue,
And oft from wayward hearts has wrung
Repentance, and contrition true,
And consecrated hearts anew.

Yours is this power—blest be the gift—
Our hearts to move, our souls to lift,
To put, with chaste harmonious vim,
The "Hallelujah" in the hymn!

"Praise God, from whom all blessings flow,"
Praise Him for music here below,
Praise Him for voices—and their songs;
Praise Him to whom all praise belongs.

St. Peter's voices—Norfolk's own!
They shall not pass of fame unknown,
When a poet, proud to press their claim
Gives this for token—In His Name!

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. H. St. George Tucker, Bishop.

The Rev. Noble C. Powell to Remain at University of Virginia.

The Rev. Noble C. Powell, rector of St. Paul's Memorial Church at the University of Virginia, has declined the call recently extended him to become rector of Christ Church, Cambridge, Mass., in succession to the Rev. Prescott Evarts, who has just retired.

The congregation of St. John's Chapel at the Episcopal Theological School and the congregation of Christ Church have been perfecting plans for a merger of the two. These plans have now been practically complete. St. John's is not a parish, but a congregation within the bounds of Christ Church Parish. The united congregation will undertake work with the students in the surrounding educational institutions, notably Harvard University and Radcliff College.

After due consideration of the call to become rector of the united congregation, Mr. Powell felt that the work which he is doing at the University of Virginia was a greater call to him just now than the one to undertake this new work. During his rectorship of St. Paul's Memorial Church a large building program has been undertaken and completed. Five years ago a parish house to care for the student activities was opened for use. Two years ago the new church, with a seating capacity of 800 in the nave and ninety in the chapel, was dedicated by the Bishop of Virginia. The late Presiding Bishop, Rt. Rev. John Gardner Murray, presided and was the celebrant at the Holy Communion which was held for the first time in the new church. A rectory has been built and will be ready for occupancy within a few weeks. Mr. Powell's decision to remain has caused much rejoicing to all those who know of the work which he is doing at the University of Virginia.

Chimes Will Be Broadcast.

Announcement of the hours during which the chimes of St. James' Church, Richmond, Va., will be broadcast over WRVA has been made by Henry Lee Valentine, of the St. James' Chapter, Brotherhood of St. Andrew. The schedule is as follows: December 16, 5:45 to 6 P. M.; December 17, 11:45 A. M. to noon; December 18, 5:45 to 6 P. M.; December 19, 11:30 to 11:45 A. M.; December 20, 5:45 to 6 P. M.; December 23, 5:45 to 6 P. M.; December 24, 11:45 A. M. to 12 noon, and December 26, 11:15 to 11:30 A. M.

In Memory of Mr. Caskie.

A service of dedication of a very beautiful Tiffany stained glass window in memory of Mr. James Caskie was included in the 11 o'clock service in St. James' Church, Richmond, Va., on Sunday, December 8. The window is given to St. James' by Mrs. James Caskie in memory of her husband. It is a resurrection scene, the angel at the tomb telling the women who have come looking for their Lord, "He is risen. He is not here."

Mr. Caskie passed on to his reward on December 19, 1928, after having served St. James' Church faithfully for thirty-five years as vestryman, junior warden and senior warden.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., Bishop

Progress on Washington Cathedral.

The local newspapers in Washington have recently published the following information, which will be of interest to all those who watch eagerly the growth and progress of Washington Cathedral:

"An application for a $350,000 building permit for construction of a portion of the north transept of the cathedral was filed recently by the George A. Fuller Co., contractors for the great Gothic edifice rising on Mount St. Alban. Permit later was issued.

The permit is for the placing of approximately 50,000 cubic feet of stone in the northernmost of the two impressive arms of the cruciform structure. This is expected to carry the construction of the north transept through the triforium gallery level.

With the granting of the permit actual work will begin on a building program, which involves an ultimate expenditure of more than $3,000,000 and which it is hoped will be completed by 1932 so that Washington Cathedral may be the scene of an inspiring religious service in commemoration of George Washington's two hundredth birthday anniversary.

The north and south transepts are a significant feature of the architecture of the cathedral, and they will have an important part in carrying out the elaborate scheme of Christian symbolism, which has been worked out for the edifice. With its completion the cathedral will be in a position to shelter congregations of approximately 3,500.

The stone used in the construction is quarried in huge blocks and shipped to a stone-cutting plant near Washington. Here smaller units are prepared in accordance with individual patterns. Each stone is sawed and shaped for a particular piece in the fabric. The construction is of solid masonry, there being no steel girders or similar supports as in commercial buildings.

During the summer the building forces at the cathedral have been concerned with the crypt of the nave and the children's chapel. The new work is expected to attract widespread interest, as it will add to the superstructure of the majestic fane which is already a distinguished landmark of the National Capital.

Like the structurally complete apse and choir, the transepts are of fourteenth century Gothic architectural design. The plans were prepared by Frohman, Robb & Little, of Washington and Boston. Philip H. Frohman is the resident architect.

The building of the north and south transepts is regarded by the Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, Bishop of Washington, as one of the most important operations ever undertaken at Washington Cathedral. He said recently: "The importance of this work cannot be overstated and the urgency of carrying it to completion before January, 1932, is made more evident when we seek to envision the great national celebration.

Church School Service Meeting.

The fall meeting of the workers for the Church School Service Program was held December 7 in the Parish Hall of St. Paul's Church, Rock Creek. Dr. Franklin J. Bohanan, rector of the church, welcomed the visitors, and Miss Emma Abbott, who was re-elected Supervisor of the Church School Service Program for the Diocese of Washington, presided. Miss Frances Withers, former member of the Department of Religious Education of the National Council, made the address, telling the children about the work among the Indians in South Dakota, to which place the children are preparing to send Christmas boxes. The meeting closed with a social hour and refreshments, served in St. Paul's splendid and up-to-date parish hall.

B Branches Bazaar.

The B Branches of the Woman's Auxiliary in the Diocese of Washington held a missionary bazaar, lasting three days, in Epiphany Parish Hall, beginning December 11 and lasting each day from 2 to 10 P. M. Booths representing almost every mission field in the Church, lovely articles made in the mission schools and craft shops, a Japanese tea room, with coolie coats, place cards, prints, curios and dolls dressed by a Kyoto Branch of the Auxiliary, mahogany book ends, frames, etc., from Santo Domingo, Chinese embroideries, handwoven and other articles from our mountain missions, embroideries and drawn work from Porto Rico and Haiti, and many other things ,were featured at this bazaar. Proceeds were returned to the mission field from which the articles came, thus helping in a very wide area. There was also an open market, where a variety of articles were sold, including foodstuffs. The entire management of the bazaar was directed by the B Branches of the Diocese.

Department of Religious Education.

The coaching class of the Department of Religious Education of the Diocese of Washington will meet Sunday evening, December 15, at St. Stephen's Church at 6 o'clock. A light supper will be served, after which teachers will arrange themselves in groups according to the courses taught, for the study of the Sunday-school lessons as given in the Christian Nurture Series.

Parish Halls.

St. Stephen's Church, a new and progressive parish, is another added to the list which has recently been equipped with an up-to-date parish hall. Other churches in Washington which have recognized this as a necessity rather than a luxury, and have successfully put through the project of such added equipment, are St. Alban's Church, St. Paul's Church, Rock Creek, St. John's Church, Georgetown. Many others have been adequately equipped for some time. St. John's Church, Georgetown, the most recent to accomplish this work, is receiving congratulations on its fine new building, which is estimated to have cost about $40,000. Christ Church, Georgetown, a sister church of St. John's, has effected excellent plans for its parish hall by the activity of its rector, Rev. E. Pinckney Wroth, who has devoted much time and service to this work, and gifts amounting to $15,000 are in hand for this urgently needed building. Work was not begun, as had been hoped during the past summer, however, and no definite time is in view, when the people of the church may look forward to its accomplishment.

M. M. W.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Rt. Rev. Thomas J. Garland, D. D., Bishop
Rt. Rev. Francis M. Taitt, S. T. D., Coadjutor.

Gift of Church and Endowment.

An anonymous gift of $400,000 for the building of an Episcopal Church and parish house in Philadelphia was announced by Bishop Garland in the course of an informal report on the condition of the Pennsylvania Diocese to the Church Club at its annual meeting in the Bellevue-Stratford, December 5.

A site for the new parish has not yet been chosen, but it will be located somewhere in Haverford township, which includes the communities of Brookline, Oakmont and Llauerch.

Of this sum $300,000 will be used in actual building and the purchase of a site, while the remaining $100,000 will be used as an endowment. It is expected that the contribution will be increased to a total of $500,000 before the actual work of erecting the church and parish house will have begun.

Bishop Garland declared the general condition of the Diocese was the most hopeful in the eighteen years of his administration. For the first time in his knowledge, the Bishop said, the most prominent and wealthy parishes will contribute the entire quota asked of them for missionary work.

Organ Dedicated.

Organists of many Episcopal churches in Philadelphia and vicinity participated Saturday afternoon in the dedication of the new organ installed in the Chapel of the Church Farm School for Boys at Glen Loch. Under the direction of Harold W. Gilbert, organist and choirmaster of Old St. Peter's Church and director of music at the Farm School, upwards of 100 boys of the school rendered a special musical program. Bishop Garland officiated at the dedication service at 4 o'clock. Following the service Archer Gibson, one of New York City's prominent organists, gave a recital. The organ is the gift to the school of Mr. and Mrs. Roland L. Taylor, of Philadelphia, in memory of their son, Roland Leslie Taylor.

Missionary Addresses.

Missionaries from various fields of missionary work occupied a number of pulpits of Episcopal churches Sunday, December 8, for the purpose of presenting intimate and close up glimpses of personal missionary expeiences. The Rev. George P. Mayo, whose field covers the Virginia mountaineers in whom President Hoover is interested, spoke at the morning service in Holy Trinity, West Chester.

David Driver, a lay teacher in the Southern Cross School, Brazil, spoke at the morning service in Christ Church, Germantown. Rev. Chen-Su-Tang spoke at Epiphany, West Philadelphia, and at Christ Church, Media, in the morning, on conditions in China. Rev. Leroy A. Jahn, at St. Peter's Church at 11 A. M., described life among the mountaineers of North Carolina. Rev. A. B. Parsons presented Liberia at the Phillips Brooks Chapel of Holy Trinity Church in the morning, and Rev. E. L. Souder spoke on the Philippines at Trinity, Collingdale, at 8 P. M.

SOUTHWESTERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. Robert C. Jett. D. D., Bishop.

Progress in Religious Education and Young People's Work.

Although only one month has passed since the appointment of Mr. John M. Garrison as Director of Religious Education in Southwestern Virginia, a great deal of interest is being manifested in all parts of the Diocese in plans for the promotion of organizations for young people and for consultation and instruction in Church school management.

At St. John's and Christ Churches, Roanoke, and St. Paul's, Lynchburg, Mr. Garrison has had several meetings with teachers and leaders. In each of these churches Christmas pageants are in course of preparation; that at St. Paul's having as its leader the director of the Little Theater in Lynchburg. Also in each of these churches the young people's work is being reorganized and is gaining new impetus.

Of especial importance is the Teacher Training Institute that opened December 4 in the parish house of St. Paul's, Lynchburg, with forty-five persons present, representing Grace Memorial, St. John's and St. Paul's at Lynchburg, Ascension at Amherst, St. John's at Bedford and Emmanuel at Madison Heights. The Institute is being held on Wednesday nights, three before and three after Christmas. The Rev. Dr. Thomas D. Lewis, of Amherst, is teaching a course in the Life of Christ and Mr. Garrison has two courses; (1) Methods and Plans for Church School Teachers and (2) Problems of Church School Administration.

COLLECT FOR THIRD SUNDAY IN ADVENT.

O Lord Jesus Christ, Who at Thy first coming didst send Thy messenger to prepare Thy way before Thee: Grant that the ministers and stewards of Thy mysteries may likewise so prepare and make ready Thy way, by turning the hearts of the disobedient to the wisdom of the just, that at Thy second coming to judge the world we may be found an acceptable people in Thy sight, who liveth and reignest with the Father and the Holy Spirit ever, one God, world without end. Amen.

COLLECT FOR ST. THOMAS' DAY.

FOR A PREACHER.

"Who maketh his ministers a flaming fire."—Ps. 104:4.

"Hold him in stillness before Thee,
Shelter him under the blood,
Shield him from forces of evil
Pressing upon as a flood;
Bring him a coal from the altar,
Purify, making him free,
Grant in the light of Thy Spirit
Fresh revelations of Thee.
Thou who hast risen upon him
Kindle his soul into flame,
Burn till his innermost being
Glows with the love of Thy name;
Melt him to mighty outpouring,
Lead him to praise and rejoice,
Light-giving, life-breathing Spirit,
Quicken the Word of Thy choice."

Christmas Cheer.

Then there are the lonely and the sorrowful who say that they cannot bear or share in the happiness of this time (Christmas). The contrast is too great for the lonely, and the associations too bitter for the sorrowful; and indeed I am grieved for them. The image of happy homes where many meet together brings natural sadness to those who sit alone in their rooms and hear no pleasant voices. . . . Yet, there are efforts which the soul should make; and to lift ourselves above loneliness and sorrow into sympathy with the happiness of others is one of those efforts in fulfilling which the solitary and the sorrowful find peace and consolation. To dwell on loneliness, to cherish sorrow like a child, is to dwell upon one's self, and is sure to double loneliness and to double sorrow.

Loneliness is often our own fault. We have not brought others enough into our own life, or we have repelled others by making too many claims upon them, or by seeking too much sympathy for ourselves and giving too little to others. No one need be lonely in life, if he try hard enough to get out of self, and to get into the lives of those around him. If you are lonely, comfort the lonely, and you will forget your loneliness in love. That will hallow the day and fill it with its own sacred joy.—Rev. Stopford A. Brooke.

Christ is walking life's shores again!
Christ is choosing His fishermen,
With nets far spread for their hauling!
Christ looks in at the office door!
Christ is searching mill and store—
It's you! It's you, He's calling.
Lift the sail, with its blood red cross!
Lift it where the wild seas toss
Till all lands hail its glowing!
Who will help where it cleaves the dark?
Who will be a John or Mark?
Clasp Christ's hand, and be going.
—Daniel Henderson.

The editor of the Family Department regrets that the following article was received too late to appear before December 8. It is published now in the hope that some may be reminded of the great need and a tested and helpful method of meeting it:

Lest Ye Forget.

If you were a Russian exile, lucky enough to be harbored, say, in Prague, you might, if you were among the fortunate few who have work and a little money for food, be having a dinner such as this:

Bortsch soup Black bread
Russian tea

And you would be thankful.

If you lived in certain districts of Northwest China, where flood and drought and pest have done their worst for two or three successive years, you would face the day with no food whatever and none in prospect for tomorrow, and the sight of your starving children would wring your heart, for you can neither buy, beg nor steal food for them.

There is no food. Every root and bit of edible green thing, even the straw in the pillows, has been eaten.

If you were nearer the line of relief—carried on by the China Famine Relief Commission (at the head of which is an able American man, Dwight Edwards) you would be allowed a ration of mullet gruel, with perhaps a bit of boiled cabbage, and you would be glad of the chance to "work this out" on the reclamation project they have under way.

If you were in India, not in the famine area, where roots and shrubs and weeds would have to suffice, you would face—and that eagerly—a dinner consisting of a handful of parched rice. If you were better off there might be a portion of "Dahl" curry (curried split peas) which, eaten with rice, is the standby of the common people.

Porto Rican natives, who are still suffering from the effects of last year's hurricane, which ruined coffee and sugar plantations and seriously damaged pineapple, cocoanut and citrus crops, have faced all year a scarcity of their simple food, which consists of little else than rice, salt codfish and native coffee. If this is not obtainable your entire family may have to subsist for weeks on plantains (bananas) baked in the open fire.

If you faced poverty in our own Southland, either in a rough mountain shack or a negro cabin, there would be perhaps a meal of cornbread and clabbered milk or possibly grits and gravy.

But you are none of these.

You are a fairly prosperous individual, sure of three good meals a day, with an especially fine one on fifty-two Sundays of the year. You eat these without thinking of the hundreds of millions whose hunger is never actually satisfied.

They are so remote, those millions.

Golden Rule Sunday is a Lest-Ye-Forget day. A day in which you are asked to meditate on these unfortunate ones of the earth, who, if the Golden Rule were practiced instead of being merely quoted, would be having a fair chance in the world. It is for these, particularly the innocent children in these areas of need, that Golden Rule Sunday is observed.

To aid your imagination you are asked to share, to some extent, their frugality—to eat a simple instead of a bountiful dinner and to give the difference, plus as much more as your imagination has scope, to be used to relieve the suffering for which these children are in no way responsible and which is far removed from God's plan for them.

If religion is, as some one has said, "helping God to do His work", then your job is all cut out for you.

Don't shirk it.

The Golden Rule Foundation, of 1 Madison Avenue, New York City, sponsors the Golden Rule Sunday observance and will distribute in full all funds sent to it, where the need is greatest.

Father and Son.

It is a tragedy when a son does not love his father. Whose fault is it? It may be the fault of either or both. But it is more likely to be the fault of the father, for he brought the son into the world, and has had his opportunity for the training of the child since babyhood. In one of the Farm Mother's Letters in The Sunday-School Times she wrote: "It was not so long ago that a college boy said to me a thing that shocked and pained me then and has haunted me ever since. He said, 'You can't imagine how many fellows there are who don't seem to like their fathers'." That there is something wrong in the relationship of parents and children today, in countless families, is an undeniable fact. And that the blame is chiefly the parents', or that it starts with the parents, is equally undeniable. The God-given solution is love. When a father truly and consistently and persistently loves his son, the boy is pretty sure both to like and to love his father. "Honour thy father and thy mother" is God's word to the child; but the father and the mother should give the child something to honor. The best they can give is love: that miracle-love described in 1 Cor. 13, without which even parenthood "profiteth nothing". This love suffers long, is kind, is not easily provoked, never fails. It does not hesitate to discipline or even punish the child when this is needed; but when love punishes, the love is more prominent than the punishment. Of course this sort of love is possible only in a Christian parent, wholly yielded to the Lord and abiding in him. If we could have a generation of truly Christian fathers, whose fatherhood constantly showed the love shed abroad in their hearts by the Holy Spirit, we should have a generation of sons of whom it would be said: "You can't imagine how many fellows there are who seem to like their fathers."—Sunday-School Times.

The Living Christ.

Contemplation of the forces of evil arrayed against us in the spiritual warfare must serve to deepen the conviction of every man of us that we are called of God to this vital and unselfish mission. Think of the magnitude of the forces of sin and shame. It is enough to stagger us and to cause our hearts to quail, did we not remind ourselves that we are the great brotherhood and that Christ, with whom resides all power in heaven and on earth, is in our midst.

Think also of the activity of these evil forces and influences. I remind you that theirs is a ceaseless activity. They take no vacations. Like gravitation, they are constantly at work, tugging men downward. In all my many years of mingling with young men of the various nations I have never found sin or organized evil lifting one man upward.

Think again of the wonderful ingenuity of evils of our day. This is enough to challenge our admiration. How many times their headwork puts us to shame. What marvelous adaptation of means to nefarious ends! What striking knowledge of modern psychology! Let us not only think, but be stirred to warfare as we think of the cruelty of the forces of the devil. It is remorseless cruelty.

The only secret of world-conquering power lies in fixing the gaze of men on Christ, who alone imparts the courage, strength, endurance and vitality to wage successful spiritual warfare. I do not fear the forces arrayed against us. "Greater is He that is in you than he that is in the world."—John R. Mott in New York Christian Advocate.

HOPE.

I dreamed a dream so beautiful
That all the beauties of the earth
Were compassed in its fold.
Pale stardust glittered through my dream
And dawns of purple amethyst
Held rays of sunset gold.

I lived the dream for many days;
It grew apace with wondrous grace
Until it filled my life,
And then the very thought of it
Would fill my eyes with happy tears
And cut as with a knife.

The stirring, glowing hope of it,
The breathless, flowing joy of it
Became a symphony
Of flute-like notes and singing chords
Which echoed through my every hour.
Oh, happy, happy me.

But now my shining dream is o'er,
The radiant sunshine is no more;
In quiet grief I lay
Around the ashes of my hopes.
From dark to dark my spirit gropes;
I cannot face the day.

Ah! Say not so, sore wounded heart.
From every lovely flower that fades
New flowers spring to view.
Then, think you, 'tis too much to hope,
Too much to ask of God in prayer,
It may be so with you?

God loves the dreamer and the dream,
No dream was e'er in vain.
Look up into the heaven's blue
And dare to dream again.

GIFTS OF THE YEAR.

Springtime gave me lovely things—
Leafy spray and bonny wings;
Pussy willow, crocus sweet,
Green grass springing at my feet.

Summer days were winged with fun,
Sweet with show'r and golden sun;
Woodsy trails I followed free,
Glad as butterfly and bee.

Autumn gave me gifts of gold,
All my eager hands could hold—
Ripened fruit and garnered sheaves,
Nuts and pumpkins, burnished leaves.

Winter's offerings are jolly—
Snowy spruces, wreaths of holly,
Skating, coasting on the hill,
Cheeks a-tingle, heart a-thrill.

Every season's full of blessing,
Rich with gifts for our possessing;
So in gratitude we raise
Voice and heart in joyous praise.

Thad and the Turkeys.

It was early in the spring when Thad's father gave him the turkeys. There were four brown turkey hens and a big gobbler that strutted importantly around the yard.

"If you earn enough with these turkeys to buy your winter suit," Thad's father said, "you can spend the rest of the money they bring for whatever you want to get."

"Oh," gasped Thad, beginning to think of a catcher's mitt and all the other things he wanted to have.

"It takes so much watching to raise turkeys here," the boy's father continued, "that I think you will earn whatever you get for them. Last year, you know, half of the young ones died during a big rainstorm. And some animal caught most of those that were left."

"Oh, I'll watch," promised Thad. "I'll take the best care of them."

The first thing Thad did was to fix some nests in an unused shed. If the eggs were laid there, the boy thought, an animal wouldn't be so apt to find them as in the outside nests that the turkey hens were accustomed to choose for themselves.

Those hens, however, couldn't have understood the danger there was in laying their eggs in outdoor nests. Each one stole off shyly and selected a nest that even Thad with all his watching couldn't find for a long time.

One day when the boy had walked down the road to meet his father he caught a glimpse of one of the hens coming out of the brush by the roadside. He couldn't find the nest then, but later, after the hen had begun to sit on the speckled eggs, Thad discovered her one day.

Another nest was found in some coarse grass very close to the road, and another far out in the field. Where the fourth turkey nested Thad never knew. Evidently some wild animal found her nest before the boy did. For that turkey disappeared and never returned.

The first few weeks Thad kept the turkeys in a large pen to prevent their wandering into deep, wet grass. And after that he corralled them whenever a thunder-storm threatened.

One warm afternoon Thad went over to John Werner's to play ball. The boy didn't think about the dark clouds that had begun to race over the sky until he heard a rumbling sound of thunder.

Although he ran as fast as he could, Thad didn't reach home until the rain was pouring down. He met his mother in the yard with an apronful of young turkeys. "The rest are in the shed," Thad's mother said. "We may be able to save these if we dry them by the kitchen stove."

Only two turkeys died that time. Another storm took three more. That happened while Thad's father was in the hospital, and the boy had gone with his mother to visit him.

When fall came there were twenty-nine young turkeys wandering over the fields in the daytime and roosting in the shed at night. Every time Thad threw out grain for the young birds he counted them to be sure none was missing. And almost every time the turkeys were fed, Thad thought how he would hate to sell them when the time came. For they followed him around at feeding time, making queer little noises that made the boy think they were talking to him.

One night late in October there was a great commotion at the barnyard. The noise woke up Thad's father, who rushed out to see what had caused the disturbance. "It may be a fox or a coyote," he called to his wife as he left the house. Thad woke up and followed his father sleepily.

No animal was found at the chicken-house nor in the shed where the turkeys roosted, but the dog was barking behind the grove. And in the morning, when they could be counted, Thad discovered that three of the young turkeys were missing.

"It was probably a fox," Thad's father said. "And if it was, he is apt to return for more turkeys."

"Let's sell them," suggested Thad quickly. "I don't like to do that, either. Still, I'd rather sell them than have them caught by a fox."

Two days later Thad and his father took the turkeys to town. A new winter suit was selected for the boy and then there were twenty-seven dollars left. "Oh, I'm rich!" exclaimed Thad. "Can I do just what I want to with the money?"

"Of course," answered his father. "That was the agreement, wasn't it?"

"I'll get a catcher's mitt," planned Thad. "Oh, and ever so many other things I've wanted."

While Thad waited to decide how to spend it, the money was kept in a small drawer in his mother's room. Several times every day it was counted. It was fun to think how very much money there was.

Thad was in the kitchen one morning, mending a kite, when the postman brought a special delivery letter for his mother. "It's from grandmother," she said after she had read a minute. "She wants—"

"Wants what?" asked Thad.

"She isn't well and—and she wanted me to know it," finished his mother soberly.

Mrs. Werner came just then to ask Thad's mother to help her with some sewing. While they talked the boy sat on the stairs to finish mending the kite. He didn't notice what his mother was saying until he heard, "Oh, I mustn't think of going. With the hospital bill to pay there isn't money enough to pay the expense of a trip. Why, the railway fare is twenty-five dollars."

"It's too bad," sympathized Mrs. Werner. "Since your mother isn't well, it would mean a good deal to her to have you there for Thanksgiving."

"That's what grandmother wrote for, and mother wouldn't tell," concluded Thad.

The kite was mended and Thad had time to try it before dinner was ready. But he came running in as fast as he could when he heard his mother call dinner. He watched closely while the food was being put onto the table, while his mother took her place, and while—

"What's this?" asked his mother in surprise as she picked up an envelope which must have been slipped onto her plate just then. "For a turkey trip," she read before she counted the five five-dollar bills that were inside the envelope and that had been counted by Thad so many times.

"Oh, I couldn't take the money you've worked so hard to earn," began the mother slowly.

"Father said I could spend it for just what I wanted," broke in Thad emphatically. "And I'd rather spend it to have you go to grandmother's than anything."

"But you want a catcher's mitt and—and so many things," objected his mother.

"There'll be enough left for the mitt and—well, I haven't really decided on anything else," grinned Thad.

Thad's mother looked very happy while she got ready for the trip. That made the boy very sure there was nothing else he wanted to spend that turkey money for so much as to have his mother go to grandmother's.—Junior World.

Santa Claus Runs the Blockade.

Rev. J. J. Clopton.

The last year of the War Between the States was drawing to a close. Gaunt want stalked the Southland. As the joyous festival of Christmas drew near, the children of the stricken "Confederacy" did not know and feel like their elders the gloom. The children at "The Mount", the ancestral home of the Prestons in rural Virginia, were all assembled in the nursery, under the watchful care of "Mammy Susan", who had faithfully served three generations of the Prestons. "Old Massa" had long passed away amidst the strife of Civil War, and "Young Massa" had been assigned by the Confederate Government to blockade running from Nassau to Wilmington. Daily the members of "The Mount" household were expecting their father, and it was a secret with their mother and "Mammy Susan" that a successful run into Wilmington to Captain Preston's steamer would mean a bountiful visit of "Santa Claus". Christmas was only a few days away and old "Mammy Susan" was full of the Christmas spirit for her youthful charges. With baby Jack on her lap and the others wistfully standing around, she sought their interest in her talk.

"Chillun, yore paw is gwine to come home for Christmas. I knows. He got yore letter to Santa Claws, and I knows old Santa Claws done got all his presents for you all safely stuck down in his sleigh. Now, you hang up yore stockin's and go fast asleep, and when I hears ole Santa Claws' bells I'se gwine to see he don't forgit you. We's gwine to have a good tuckey, too. Ole Zack done promise me he gwine to get one of dem wild tuckeys over in de big woods, even if dem dar sojers did take las' one of young missis' tuckeys. We's gwine to have a real Christmas, like ole missis used git us in de big house, when I was a little gurl like you all."

Christmas Eve had arrived. A deep snow covered the ground, and it was still snowing. A blazing wood fire filled the nursery with cheer. All the house was filled with excitement and preparation. "Mammy Susan" got the children to bed early. Before she tucked them away, she quieted them with many promises "You all done got a beautiful tree. I seed it fo' dark, when Zack toted it in for you all into de big hall. Dis gwine to be de best Chrismus Santa Claws ever brung you. Now go to sleep and I'se gwine to call you in time in de morning."

"Mammy Susan," in spite of her promises to the children, was quite uneasy as to results. Captain Preston had gotten through the fleet guarding the outer harbor at Wilmington. He had written he would, if possible, get home for Christmas and "Mammy Jane" was assured he had not forgotten his pledge to act as Santa Claus' deputy. Through the kindly offices of an English sea captain, also a blockade runner, he had secured a bountiful supply of English and German toys. Mrs. Preston called "Mammy Susan" into the hall and told her the good news.

"Missus, I does hope young massa will git here. De storm is mighty bad, but it am not bedtime yet, and we'll sit up long as we can."

After some time "Mammy Susan" induced Mrs. Preston to lie down and she would watch.

"You go into de big room, Missis, and I'll watch. I'll call you when massa comes."

Complete quiet now reigned. Mammy Susan sat before the huge open wood fire. Her arduous duties of the day and early evening and the heat from the fire made her very drowsy. Finally she began to nod. She was aroused by the barking of the house dogs and then by a loud knock. She quickly arose and went to the door. In addition to the door being locked, it had a heavy bar across it. As it was war times, "Mammy Susan" took no chances of surprise.

As she advanced to the door she seized a fowling piece which hung over the mantle, then approached the door. The storm had subsided and she called in a loud voice, "Who dar? Dis ain't any night for folks to be out and prowlin'."

A reply quickly came:

"Open the door and let me in, Mammy Susan. I'm almost frozen. I walked from the station, and with snowdrifts and my Santa Claus pack to boot, I thought I would never get here."

"Young massa, I knowed you'd git here. Thank de good Lord, we ain't gwine dissapint the chillun."

The door was quickly opened and Captain Preston looked like a genuine Santa Claus. Snow covered him from head to foot and his beard was no longer black, but white.

Mrs. Preston heard the welcome of "Mammy Susan"; and overjoyed at the safe arrival of her husband, she rushed into the hall. Captain Preston rapidly rid himself of his pack, and when it was opened there was a display of beautiful toys and clothes, both novelties in those strenuous war times.

"Won't de chillun be supprised!" "Mammy Susan" exclaimed. "Dar is a real wax doll, and ain't she cute wid her real hyar."

At daylight there was great excitement. All the slaves from the nearby "quarters" were chatting like blackbirds, on the outside and knocking on the great hall door for admission. Mammy Susan and Mrs. Preston and her husband were up and busy lighting the home-made candles on the Christmas tree. Fires had been lit before, and the whole "Great House" was bright from bottom to top. The children had been awakened by "Mammy Susan", and rushed into the hall, where the huge Christmas tree was ablaze with its candles. Stockings had been rifled and Mary was joyous with her beautiful wax doll. Jack rejoiced in his soldier suit and sword, and baby Lucy in Mammy Susan's arms hugged her beautiful toy dog.

"Ole Santa Claws suttingly has 'membered us all. He done brung me a brand new dress, and shoes, and hankchuff."

All the servants were remembered by Captain Preston, and as the first beams of the sun shone into the great mansion they all left to go to their "quarters". At breakfast, when the family gathered, though the storeroom had been depleted by a recent raid of "de bluecoats", as "Mammy Susan" called the Union soldiers, there was no lack. Buckwheat cakes, real Porto Rico molasses, real coffee that Captain Preston had brought through the blockade, and crisp fried rabbits, which Old Zack, the head house-servant, had trapped, graced the table, besides the fine wild turkey. The guns of war, at least for a time, were silent, and the joyous peace of former Christmas-tide was realized. Later the family carriage was driven to the door and all, including Mammy Susan, crowded into the ancient coach and drove to the old colonial church, which other Prestons had largely built and in which they had worshiped for generations.

To this day the Preston children, now grown old, have never discovered how "Mammy Susan" kept her promise to "gib de chillun de best Chrismus dey eber seed".

"That Isn't Funny."

A group of Mrs. Wall's first grade girls were earnestly engaged in showing each other the dolls they had been making dresses for.

It was at the regular morning intermission and by special permission the girls had taken their beloved dolls out under the big maple tree to their playhouse.

"Oh! Mary Anne, you have such a pretty doll!" said third grade Betty. "Did you make her dress this morning?"

"Yes, but Mrs. Wall showed me how to do it. Oo-oo."

Just then a line of the little boys of the class ran past the girls and Glenn, the class tease, snatched the doll out of Mary Anne's hands and ran a few yards away with it dangling by its feet.

"Don't do that! Give me my doll!" screamed Mary Anne in terror.

The boys all laughed as the little girl began to cry. Glenn kept just out of her reach with the precious doll.

"Cry-baby, cry!" yelled Glenn, in savage glee.

Betty ran up to Glenn and looked at him seriously for a second before speaking.

"That isn't funny, Glenn Wilson. My mother said only a bully will tease girls and smaller boys."

"Oh, she did, did she, Miss Smarty," and Glenn gave a wicked pull to a lock of curly hair.

"And she said boys who tease in such a rough way do not know how hateful they are."

The approach of Mrs. Wall caused the boys to hurry away. Glenn threw the doll into Betty's arms and was off immediately.

That afternoon after school Glenn ran to his mother as was his custom, but his manner was unusually thoughtful.

"Mother, is a boy a bully when he teases?" he asked seriously.

The mother looked closely at her son for a few second.

"Tell me about, Son, and I'll see."

"Well, I teased the girls today and Betty said it wasn't funny and that her mother said a boy who did such things was a bully."

"What did you do to tease the girls?"

"I just took Mary Anne's doll for a few minutes and ran just a little way to make her think I was going to keep the doll and treat it rough. But I didn't mean it, and I didn't hurt the doll. I just wanted to have some fun. But Mary Anne is such a cry-baby."

His mother was silent for a few moments, then she seemed to change the subject entirely.

to visit us for a few days next week."

"Oh, shucks! Mother, I'd lots rather Uncle Joe would come."

"Why?"

"'Cause I love Uncle Joe lots better. He tells me the nicest stories and helps me make airplanes." He paused and then continued in an almost sullen tone, "All Uncle Tom does is just to pick at me and pretend he is going to hurt my pony. I believe he would, too, if he got a good chance."

"Glenn, Son, you have said enough to show us both that you do not like to be teased, for that is what Uncle Tom does; that is just the way Mary Anne will feel about you if you keep on teasing her. Do you see what I mean?"

"Sure, I see, but Gee, Mother, I didn't mean it that way! I was just funnin' with her."

"Of course you were. Uncle Tom is 'just funning' with you, but you do not think it very funny, do you?"

"Well, I never did think about it like that. I guess I'd better not tease the girls that way again. But what can I do?" he asked earnestly.

"I can't exactly say, but we shall have to study it all out. I do know, though, that the little boy who forms a habit of rough teasing often goes through life with most persons disliking him. What we shall have to do is to be careful that most of our jokes are on ourselves. Don't you think so? Then we can tell if they hurt."—Lenore Bailey, in National Kindergarten Association Release.

Jack's Trade.

Uncle Jack was on the front porch apparently absorbed in his newspaper. His nephew and namesake was nearby on the lawn trying to trade a knife to Bob Kenney. The knife looked all right, but Uncle Jack knew that it was not good for much. He also knew that Jack was perfectly aware of its worthlessness. And yet he heard him saying persuasively: "You won't very often run up against a better-looking knife. Better take it while you can get it. I've got two others, so you see I do not really need it."

After a little more urging Bob took it, and Jack came up the steps whistling, a half-dollar in his pocket in the place of the knife.

"Good trade, that!" he said complacently as he dropped into the hammock.

"Was it?" said Uncle Jack soberly.

"Well, perhaps it was better for me than it was for Bob, but that was his lookout, not mine. I did not say a word that was not true. I said it was a mighty nice looking knife, and it is. It was up to him to find out whether it was good for anything or not. Guess there wouldn't be many trades made if folks ran their own goods down."

"I was rather interested in a little story I happened to run across the other day," said Uncle Jack presently. "A wealthy American living in Paris was suspicious that he was harboring a thief in his household. Various little articles mysteriously disappeared from time to time, and occasionally small sums of money were missing from his purse; but do his best, he could get no clue to the thief.

"Finally, he hit upon an experiment.

He procured a small vial of a certain acid and put it in a little case on his dressing table with several coins. If any one attempted to remove one of the coins he would upset the vial, and the acid would stain the hands of the thief an indellible yellow.

"The very next day he found the case had been tampered with, two of the coins were missing and the vial had been upset. Shortly after he discovered the telltale stains on his valet's hands. Very likely the fellow, though he may not have suspected the trap, was dismayed when he saw the stain; but I sometimes wonder if we realize that every time we say or do or act falsely it leaves an ugly stain, not on our hands, but on our souls. No matter how small and insignificant the sin seems to us, it makes a wretched stain."

Jack made no comment, but his uncle saw him glance involuntarily at his hands as if half expecting to find yellow marks, and very soon he got up and strolled down into the orchard. Somehow he did not feel so proud over his trade as he had. Perhaps, after all, it wasn't smart to "do" a fellow like that. When you stopped really to think about it, it did seem very much like cheating.

"Uncle Jack never preaches at a fellow, but he always manages to have a story to tell that makes you feel mean when you've done anything out of the way," he thought. "I might as well hunt up Bob and buy the knife back. I won't have any peace of mind until I do, that's sure."—Zion's Herald.

IF SANTA SHOULD GIVE A DINNER.

If Santa should give a dinner,
O, wouldn't it be a feast,
With a long, white table that stretched for miles
Around the world at least?

And wouldn't the children come flocking
Through the snowiest, blowiest weather?
And their smiles, how they'd spread into one big mile
As they all sat down together!

Everybody's Boat.

There was once a man down on Cape Cod who wished to build a boat for himself. So he got the timber together at the edge of the water and set to work to lay the keel of the boat. The keel of a boat is like the foundation of a house. You must build that first.

But the captain had no sooner begun work than one of his neighbors passed by and said, "Mornin', cap'n. I see you're goin' to build a boat."

"Yes," said the captain, "I thought I'd build a boat for myself."

"Well, I wouldn't lay the keel that way." And then he showed the captain how he would lay the keel.

"I don't know but you're right," said the captain. And he set to work to build it that way.

Soon another neighbor drove by and said, "Mornin', captain, buildin' a boat, eh?"

"Yes," said the captain. "Didn't know but I would."

"That ain't the right way to lay the keel," said the neighbor. "I'll show you the best way."

"I guess you're right," said the captain. So he began to work on the keel that way.

Several neighbors passed in the course of the day, and no two agreed as to which was the right way to lay the keel of a boat. Each one thought his way was the best. And the captain tried to make use of all their suggestions.

At last the boat was finished. But it was useless. It just went around in circles, and the captain drew it upon the shore in disgust and left it there to rot. Then he set to work nearby to build another boat. But he no sooner began to work on the keel than his neighbors began to make more suggestions.

Finally the captain said, "See here, that is everybody's boat on the beach there. I took everybody's advice building that, and it's no use at all. I'm going to build this boat my own way."

And he built the second boat his own way. When it was done it was a great success.

The person who tries to please everybody usually comes out about the way the captain did with his first boat. He usually ends by pleasing nobody, not even himself! St. Paul speaks about people who are "blown about by every wind of doctrine", and he says they don't make much headway. They listen to everybody, and so they are always changing their course.

Have you ever seen a chameleon? It is a little animal like a lizard, and it takes on whatever color it is near. It doesn't seem to have any color of its own.

Now the world does not like colorless people. It likes those who have a mind of their own. It wants a man, if he is going to build a boat, to have an idea how he is going to build it, and then stick to that idea. It likes boys and girls when they know what they want to be like to stick to their course and go straight ahead.

When you are tempted to change your mind too often remember the captain and everybody's boat.—Story Sermons for Children.

Two Ways to Be Sure.

Discriminating buyers of monuments, desirous of securing the most permanent, beautiful and perfect stone, specify Winnsboro Granite in their purchase contracts, which affords a granite of greatest crushing strength; freest from water, lime and iron, which are deleterious, and in time tend to disfigure the monument; and which affords a stone of an even and beautiful crystalline structure.

The buyer may be absolutely sure of getting the real Winnsboro Granite, if he insists upon the dealer delivering a certificate from the management of Winnsboro Granite Corporation, to the stock used being Winnsboro Granite; but to make assurance double sure the purchaser may test the monument by throwing water upon it. If there are then apparent any black or white streaks, black or white splotches of size, or if there is any wave in the grain, some mistake has been made, and the monument is not of Winnsboro Granite..

Mistakes are always possible, as there is quarried from the Winnsboro quarries a second grade stone, known as "Smith stock"; also as there is quarried from many other quarries stones not so good, but resembling Winnsboro Granite.

The water test made three times at the plant before shipment assures first grade stone being shipped on orders for Winnsboro Granite; and such stone is certificated as Winnsboro Granite. Errors, however, might occur unintentionally, and all dealers should make the test above suggested before cutting a piece of stone. Buyers can be assured by the same test.

Winnsboro Granite is of flawless, even, straight grain—the ideal monumental material.

Deaths

ELIZABETH CARTER BALL LANE.

Died November 17, 1929, buried November 19, 1929, at Leesburg, Va., in the old family graveyard, at Springwood, where her father, George Washington Ball, her mother, Mary Beverly Randolph, four brothers and one sister have preceded her. Taken suddenly ill on August 1, 1929, while visiting Leesburg, she was unable to leave her bed until the final call.

She had been employed in the U. S. Treasury, as clerk, since 1918. Two sisters survive her, Mrs. Landon Minor Hill and Mrs. Nancy Randolph Baubhman.

ROBERT DYSON HAGUE.

ROBERT DYSON HAGUE, elder son of the Reverend Canon and Mrs. Dyson Hague, died at his home in London, Ontario, Canada, on Sunday afternoon, December 1, of influenza and pneumonia.

His death comes as a great shock to a large circle of friends throughout Ontario and the Canadian West.

Mr. Hague was born at Brockville. He received his education at Ridley College and the University of Toronto. Throughout his life he was distinguished as student and athlete. At Ridley he was presented with the Mason gold medal, which was voted by the boys themselves to the finest all-round boy in the school. He many times captained various teams of cricket, hockey and Rugby football.

Entering the war as private he received rapid promotion and returned to Canada after the armistice as a major, having twice been wounded.

Mr. Hague is survived by his wife, one son, his parents, a brother and a sister.

"Well done, thou good and faithful servant: thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

MRS. GEORGE CARTER.

On Thursday, October 24, 1929, MARY EYRE CARTER, wife of George Carter, died at Leesburg, Virginia.

She had been ill for over six months; her death was a release from suffering, and had been long expected. Yet, when the end came, the whole countryside mourned her as one who had been snatched suddenly from their midst.

For she was a woman of unusual parts—a noble character, a personality of rare charm—whose influence will live long.

Herself the descendant of men of position and note in Philadelphia and New York during Colonial and Revolutionary days, Mary Griffith married in 1898 George Carter, of Oatlands, great-grandson of Councillor Carter, of Naomi Hall, and eldest son or the head of that branch of the Carter family which settled in Loudoun County over one hundred and fifty years ago. By a tradition, therefore, of culture and refinement, by an education which developed her discriminating intelligence, she was well fitted to appreciate the best that modern life can offer—and, though her life was hemmed in by many restrictions, health and family reasons debarring her from participation in many of the pursuits which were dear to her—she nevertheless, impressed all who came in contact with her by her great distinction, and her intellectual and spiritual gifts.

Mrs. Carter loved art and literature. She kept up with modern thought while maintaining undisturbed a sense of the beauty of classic form, a taste for the beautiful in painting, prints and furniture—a desire to surround herself with those things only which are lovely. And her house bore witness to it.

She had a host of friends, of long standing and intimacy, others who had crossed her path not frequently, and yet all treasured a feeling of genuine admiration for her. For who could refuse recognition of the splendid courage which was hers, and which never faltered to the end, of her unswerving loyalty to those to whom her affection and love had been given. In her friendships, she gave herself unstintingly, unselfishly, sacrificed her own pleasure, her own comfort, when her sympathy was aroused and her help was needed. And to hospital and library, she gave of her best; in all charitable enterprises, she was ever to the front, working early and late, leading, cooperating with one and all, untiring in her efforts. A charming companion, too, a leading spirit in Garden Club activities and wherever friend and neighbor were wont to meet. And with it all went a delightful sense of humor, quizzical but kindly.

To the Church she gave a life long devotion. For years, and until her health forbade, she taught Sunday School at the little Oatlands Church, which her mother-in-law had built. She was the centre and inspiration of the children of the parish, she was constant in her attendance at all church services. For her religious faith, broad and nobly tolerant, deep rooted and tinged with mysticism, was of the stuff that resists change and bears continued testimony to the great truths of Christianity. She did not talk much of religion, it was her life which testified to the inner experiences of her soul. A young friend wrote of her, "She seemed to enrich everything she came in contact with, and by her life and example to make all the trivialities and unpleasant things of life, of no consequence. For she was somehow above them all."

She is survived by her husband and an only son.

L. B. KEENE CLAGGETT.

L. B. KEENE CLAGGETT, of Baltimore, an honored member of the Bar, died on November 17, 1929, in the 55th year of his age. He was born in Frederick County, Maryland, the son of Samuel and Elizabeth West Claggett, of that county. His father was a grandson of Bishop Claggett, first Bishop of Maryland, and the first Bishop consecrated in this country. On his mothers' side he was descended from one of the old and distinguished Maryland families. Samuel Claggett's maternal grandfather was a native of France and from his French ancestry Mr. Claggett received his name of Louis Benoit; his full name was Louis Benoit Keene Claggett. He received his academic education at the ancient college of St. John's, Annapolis, and his degree of Bachelor of Laws at the Law School of the University of Maryland.

Uniting with one of the leading law firms of Baltimore he had a large and important practice. His distinguished ability and high sense of honor, commanded the respect of the Bar of Maryland which was testified by the great attendance of Judges and Lawyers at his funeral services which took place at Emmanuel Church and were conducted by his close personal friend, the Bishop of Maryland. A short service took place at St. Mark's Church, "Maryland Tract", Frederick County, of which Church Mr. Claggett was a vestryman and Trustee of a portion of its endowment. The Bishop followed the funeral train to St. Mark's, along with a large company of friends from Baltimore, and conducted the services there, assisted by Rev. Edward E. Burgess, the local rector. Interment was in the Church yard amid the graves of his parents and of many who had been near and dear to him. Of a large family of brothers and sisters, two only survive him, namely, T. West Claggett, of Baltimore, and Mrs. John Matthias Kopper, of Madison, New Jesrsey.

In his manner Mr. Claggett was dignified, modest and reserved, but cordial and always ready to help and to do good. He was patient and uncomplaining during a painful illness, always a sincere Christian—his was a noble nature. He combined with the accomplishments of the gentleman the piety of the Christian.

He died in the noontide of his life, in the hightide of his usefulness, before the evening began to fall or the shadows to lengthen, mourned by many friends who loved him and regretted by many who knew his worth and usefulness.

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE.

It is probable that a similar institute for the teachers in and near Roanoke will be organized at an early date.

As rapidly as possible Mr. Garrison is getting in touch with the other churches in the Diocese in order to assist them in any way possible. On Sunday morning, December 1, he visited the Sunday school at St. John's, Wytheville. That afternoon, at the request of the rector, the Rev. Devall L. Gwathmey, the teachers and a group of the young met at the church for conference with Mr. Garrison. Notwithstanding it was a bitter cold day, 100 per cent of the teachers were present.

The Rev. F. Ernest Warren, rector of Emmanuel Church at Bristol, was recently elected President of the Kiwanis Club of that city.

Parochial Mission at St. Mary's, High Point.

The Rev. B. N. deFoe Wagner, rector of Emmanuel Church, Warrenton, has completed a preaching and teaching mission at St. Mary's Church, High Point. The mission began on Sunday morning, November 10, and the closing service was held on Sunday night, November 17. Owing to the fact that there were four revivals in progress in High Point, the attendance was confined largely to members of the congregation, although a number of outsiders did attend. When the mission closed, it was with great regret that Mr. Wagner felt compelled to decide it best not to extend it. No one can tell what the ultimate results of the mission will be; but certainly the missioner left a congregation grateful for the practical spiritual inspiration of his messages. The congregation was far above normal the Sunday following the mission, and there were many resolves made to make the personal loyalty to Christ and His Church more telling in the community. Several baptisms resulted from the Mission. Mr. Wagner won all who heard or met him, by his earnestness and the clearness of his teaching.

Rt. Rev. E. T. Helfenstein, D. D., Bishop.

Tributes Paid in Memory of Bishop Murray.

Memorial services were held at St. James' School, Maryland's Diocesan School for Boys, in honor of the late Rt. Rev. John Gardner Murray, D. D. The Rt. Rev. Edward T. Helfenstein, D. D., outlined briefly the highly dramatic life of Bishop Murray, telling how he left the coal mines to study for the ministry, how the death of his father and the responsibility of providing for his mother and several sisters and brothers drove him into the business world, where he had made enough success to bring him early financial independence and to enable him to carry to completion his boyhood religious dream.

The Rt. Rev. Philip Cook, D. D., Bishop of Delaware, made the principal address, taking Bishop Murray as the figure and developing the theme of "Power", impressing on the boys the fact that it is not sheer drive alone that brings success, that progress must be thoroughly thought out as well as willed, and that the intelligent movement toward such a conscious aim as Bishop Murray's is an excellent example to follow.

Bishop Abbott Conducts Missions at Galveston.

The Rt. Rev. H. P. Almon Abbott, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese of Lexington, conducted a preaching mission in Trinity Church, Galveston, Texas, during the first five days of December. His dynamic personality and powerful inspirational sermons were appreciated by large congregations. Especially fine were the Bishop's instructions on "The Holy Spirit", "The Sacramental Idea" and "The Holy Communion". Other features of the mission were the numerous Intercessory Prayers and the Question Box. Mrs. Abbott accompanied him and spoke to the women of the parish on the "Work of the Woman's Auxiliary". Rev. Edmund H. Gibson is rector of Trinity Church.

BETHLEHEM.

Rt. Rev. F. W. Sterrett, D. D., Bishop.

Bequeathed a Rectory.

The Church of the Mediator, Allentown, is rejoicing that after waiting for twenty-five years they at last have a rectory. Mrs. Jennie C. Foster, who entered into Paradise on October 1, 1929, left her beautiful residence within about two blocks of the church to the Mediator with a further bequest that said church shall receive $1,000 in cash and also Trinity Church, Carbondale, of this Diocese, where the late Mrs. Foster was formerly a member. Immediate possession was given to the Church of the Mediator and the rector and his wife are planning to move as soon as the wife recovers from an operation which was performed on November 29 in the Allentown Hospital. The whole Diocese congratulates the Rev. and Mrs. Merriman in having this beautiful home.

Mrs. Foster was a quiet, reserved soul with a deep piety and love for her church which only her most intimate friends ever knew. The rector writes in the Parish News: "It often happens in the lives of God's choicest followers that it is not known how much they love the church until after death has removed them from the scenes of their earthly pilgrimage."

H. P. W.

Evident Pleasure.

The Bishop of the Diocese instituted the Rev. Horace W. Stowell as the rector of the Church of the Epiphany, Glenburn, on November 6. The Rev. Mr. Stowell takes the place of the Rev. Mr. Neikirk, whose assistant he was for some time previous to his departure.

As an evidence of her pleasure in finding so suitable a man for the parish as Mr. Stowell, Mrs. Oakford placed a check on the plate at this service for five thousand dollars, which is to be applied to reduce the debt on the rectory and parish house. The congregation has done marvellously well in the last few years. The debt was over $38,000. It is now down to about $12,000.

Brotherhoods.

A Junior Brotherhood of about twenty boys was lately organized in Grace Church, Allentown, the Rev. S. F. Custard, rector.

A Senior Chapter recently was organized in Christ Church, Frackville, the Rev. Alan F. Tongue, rector.

The Rev. Thomas B. Smythe, in charge of St. Luke's Church, Reading, Pa., is organizing a Senior Chapter this month and possibly a Junior.

EAST CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. Thos. C. Darst, D. D., Bishop.

Oldest Church in Oldest Town.

At the Annual Pilgrimage on November 26 to St. Thomas' Church, Bath, the oldest church in the oldest town in North Carolina, the Hon. Josephus Daniels, Secretary of the Navy during the Wilson Administration, Chairman of the Committee to restore this historic church to its original colonial dignity, gave the historic address. The Rt. Rev. Thomas C. Darst, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese of East Carolina, presided over the Pilgrimage, celebrating the Holy Communion.

Annual Convention.

The Standing Committee of the Diocese of East Carolina announces that the next Annual Convention of the Diocese will be held in St. Paul's Church, Wilmington, North Carolina, instead of St. Paul's Church, Greenville, as announced in the new edition of the Living Church Annual. The date of the meeting will be the same as announced.

Convocations.

The Convocation of Wilmington met in November at Holy Innocents' Church, Seven Springs, the outstanding rural parish of the Diocese of East Carolina. The Convocation of Edenton met the next week in St. Luke's Church, Winterville, another rural parish that has given a number of men to the ministry of the Church. The two remaining members of this parish were the hostesses on this occasion. The Program of the Church was outlined at each meeting by the executive secretary of the diocese, Bishop Darst, being present at the later meeting.

MISSISSIPPI.

Rt. Rev. T. DuB. Bratton, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. M. Green, D. D., Coadjutor.

St. Andrew's, Jackson.

During the rectorship of the present rector, Rev. Walter B. Capers, D. D., there have been many evidences of growth in the parish numerically and financially, as well as spiritually. Perhaps no more substantial evidence of the interest of the men of St. Andrew's Parish has been exhibited than on Sunday, December 1, when, in response to the rector's preparation for a Corporate Communion, more than a hundred men received the Holy Communion, commemorating St. Andrew's Day.

Though there is no chapter of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew in this parish, through the committee system of the rector's men's Bible class the work of the Brotherhood is stressed and carried on.

Other committees of the Bible class are charged with the responsibility of other parochial activities.

The Every-Member Canvass made December 1 to meet the budget of $24,000 for parochial and extra parochial work promises at this writing to be a success.

Woman's Auxiliary.

A successful and well attended meeting of the West Missouri Diocesan branch of the Woman's Auxiliary was held in St. Mark's Church, Kansas City, the Rev. Oliver F. Crawford, rector, on Thursday, November 14. The Holy Communion was celebrated by the Rev. Henry N. Hyde, Executive Secretary of the Diocese, and the rector gave an address on phases of social service in Kansas City. After luncheon a business session was conducted by Mrs. B. S. Brown, President, which was followed by addresses by the Executive Secretary on the State of Missionary Work in the Diocese and by Miss Winifred Dunkle, of Chicago, on the aims and work of the Girls' Friendly Society. Delegates were in attendance from more than half the parishes of the diocese.

On November 17, the twenty-fifth Sunday after Trinity in St. Philip's Chapel, on the Pine Ridge Reservation, South Dakota, the Rt. Rev. W. Blair Roberts, D. D., Suffragan Bishop of South Dakota, ordained to the Diaconate, Messrs. Jefferson King, Robert White Plume and Walter Bone, native Indian Catechists. Messrs. King and White Plume were presented by the Rev. Nevill Joyner, Superintending Presbyter of the Pine Ridge Mission, and Mr. Bone by the Rev. Clayton High Wolf. Archdeacon Ashley preached the sermon and Rev. Clayton High Wolf read the Litany. All three men will work on the Pine Ridge Mission in South Dakota.

THE PRECIOUS BLOOD

Whatever results are connected with the shed blood of Christ are obtainable only, but surely, through faith in Christ. Man cannot originate nor impart them to anyone; for all these results were fully provided when Christ shed His blood. This was done once for all; and man's part is either to accept or reject, believe or disbelieve on Christ about them all.

Everlasting Covenant—"The blood of the everlasting covenant." Heb. 13:20.

Safety—"When I see the blood I will pass over you." Ex. 12:13.

Atonement—"It is the blood that maketh atonement for the soul." Lev. 17:11.

Justification—"Being now justified by His blood we shall be saved from wrath through Him." Rom. 5:9.

Redemption—"In Whom we have redemption through His blood, the forgiveness of sins." Eph. 1:7.

Peace—"Having made peace through the blood of His cross." Col. 1:20.

Cleansing—"The blood of Jesus Christ, His Son, cleanseth us from all sin." 1 John 1:7.

Remission—"Without shedding of blood is no remission." Heb. 9:22.

New Testament—"This is My blood of the New Testament." Matt. 26:28.

White Robes—"These * * * washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb." Rev. 7:14.

Overcoming—"The accuser of our brethren;—they overcame him by the blood of the Lamb, and by the word of their testimony." Rev. 12:10, 11.

Sanctification—"Wherefore Jesus also, that He might sanctify the people with His own blood, suffered without the gate." Heb. 13:12.

Purchase—"The church of God which He hath purchased with His own blood." Acts 20:28.

Entrance—"Into the holiest by the blood of Jesus." Heb. 10:19.

Is Christmas Going to Die?

A CHRISTMAS MESSAGE FROM THE REV. DYSON HAGUE,
Toronto, Canada

Is Christmas ever going to die? Christmas going to die? Never! Christmas can never die! As long as there is a child upon this earth that day will be greeted with a shout of gladness; and, for weeks before, vibrations of mystic wonder and secret mirth will fill the little hearts in every land that has ever heard of Jesus. Christmas can never die while a mother lives. The birth of that little Baby Boy in Bethlehem has wreathed a never-dying halo around the Child. All love, all sweetness, all gentleness, all innocence, all the pitying, brooding, unselfish greatness that is the everlasting miracle of the mother heart received its coronation in the Virgin Mother. Christmas can never die as long as a father thinks of that world of wistful wonder and of mystic hope evoking all his manhood, softening all his strength, as he looks down upon the little helpless babe that God has given him to cherish and to train.

As long as there is a poor man in the world, Christmas will never lose its halo. For He came down to earth from heaven to link His lot with the poor. He lived poor. He died poor. And His poverty has since been the enriching of the world. No! No! Christmas can never die! Forever, as its glorious meaning annually breaks, man will turn from the clatter and babble of the world to hear the song the angels sing.

The cry of the world to-day is ever for something up-to-date. "O, preacher," men are calling, "give us something new, something fresh." Well, here it is! "Behold," said the angel in the sky above Bethlehem, "behold, I bring you good news. I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people. For unto you is born this day in the city of David a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord." Good news of great joy! Heard a thousand times by the old, a hundred times by the young, it still comes to the astonished consciousness of those who think, with all the vividness of a glorious surprise. It is good news of great joy, ever as fresh as the morning sun, as sweet as a newly-blooming rose or a new-born babe. For the greatest thing in heaven and earth are the home, and the love of God. And the people nearest to the heart of God are the poor, the sad, the heart-sick, and the hungry. It is these that the light waves of joy immerse and the shafts of gladness irradiate at Christmastide.

"What are you going to get this Christmas?" asked one girl, and the answer came: "I've been so busy planning what I'm going to give that I haven't had time to think of what I'm going to get." That is the real spirit of Christmas. Let all who would enjoy to the full this wonderful season not secularize or materialize it as a mere season of goodwill and worldly merriment—a Christmas without Christ. Let our dear Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ be so glorified in every act of charity, in every gift, in every carol, in every choir, in every church, in every Christian home that the very stranger within our gates shall learn the wondrous story that on this first Christmas Day for them, as for us, the Child was really born, and God's own Son was really given.

"And His Name shall be called Wonderful—The Mighty God—The Everlasting Father—The Prince of Peace."

Efficient Records.

One supply house issues a fine church financial record book. This book has space for the following things: the envelope number, name, address and telephone number of each contributor opposite his account in the book; an alphabetical index of names, giving also the envelope number; a weekly record of receipts; disbursements recorded under debtor, item paid, from which fund, and the amount; and detachable quarterly statements.

With such a record book should be used the well-known duplex envelope system, which gives each member a double envelope for church expenses and missionary offering. A certain church near Philadelphia never had used such a system up to 1928. Its financial problem was becoming more and more difficult. In 1928 they introduced the envelope system and in one year's time the whole situation was greatly improved, and a large number of members who had scarcely been giving anything were making regular weekly offerings.

One concern makes a readable and comprehensive attendance record board that can be seen by the whole school. There is room on it for the date, attendance, and offering for the day and for the previous week, the number of Bibles brought to the school, the membership aim, special dates in the future and for each class the name of the teacher, enrollment, number present, and offering.

All of these pieces of equipment not only add greatly to the efficiency of any school or church, but they are valuable aids in increasing the attendance and interest. Information will gladly be sent to pastors and superintendents if requests are addressed to Church Equipment Service, The Southern Churchman, Richmond, Va.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Hail! thou ever blessed morn!
Hail! Redemption's happy dawn!
Sing through all Jerusalem,
Christ is born in Bethlehem.
—Edward Caswall.

Look out for choices; they run into habit, character, destiny.—M. D. Babcock.

The servants of Christ may well wait patiently. Their Master shall one day be acknowledged King of Kings by all the world.—Bishop J. C. Pyle.

"O little Christ Child, look Thou tonight
Within my heart,
And find Thou there the candle flame
I light for Thee."

It is good to be children sometimes, and never better than at Christmas, when its mighty founder was Himself a child. I will honor Christmas in my heart, and try to keep it all the year. I will live in the past, the present, and the future. The spirits of all three shall strive within me. I will not shut out the lessons they teach.—C. Dickens.

If ye would hear the angels sing,
Christians! see ye let each door
Stand wider than ever it stood before,
On Christmas-day in the morning.

Rise, and open wide the door;
Christians, rise! the world is wide,
And many there be that stand outside,
Yet Christmas comes in the morning.
—Dora Greenwall.

When once we have yielded to Christ's full leadership there will be some things—not perhaps wrong in themselves, we shall not do, for the regulator will be our influence over others.—Rev. Wm. Porkess, D. D.

The world has a right to look worshippers, as they come out of church in the face, and ask them, "What do you bring away from your altar, your psalm, your sermon, your benediction?" What gifts have you to distribute to your neighbors?"—Bishop Huntington.

The power to suffer is measured by the power of love. It is found at its best in God Himself. Incapacity to suffer means an abnormal, an undeveloped nature. It needed a Being perfect in pity, in compassion, in forbearance, in love, to so love the world as to give His only begotten Son to save sinners. —Bishop E. R. Hendrix.

Long years have come and gone,
And with uplifted eye,
The Church, with calm and silent hope,
Has watched the eastern sky.
At length the voice shall yet be heard,
With which all earth shall ring:
Lo, this is God, our God,
This the long-promised King."

The boy who had the loaves and fishes could have done four things with them. He could have thrown them away; he could have eaten them himself; or he could have distributed them himself among his friends; or as he did—give them to Christ; and we may do these four things with our lives.—J. D. Adam.

Christmas

Hark! the herald angels sing
Glory to the new-born King;
Peace on earth, and mercy mild,
God and sinners reconciled!

Joyful, all ye nations, rise,
Join the triumph of the skies;
With the angelic host proclaim,
Christ is born in Bethlehem!

Christ, by highest heaven adored;
Christ, the everlasting Lord:
Late in time behold Him come,
Offspring of the Virgin's womb.

Veiled in flesh the Godhead see;
Hail the Incarnate Deity,
Pleased as Man with man to dwell;
Jesus, our Immanuel!

Gifts

Electricity is everywhere, in everything, and nobody knows what it is. We develop it with simple appliances and use it for innumerable purposes. This time of the year the Christmas impulse and influence, memories, opportunities, hopes, are all about us, living from nineteen centuries ago, immortally lovely, invisible to the eyes, clearly perceptible to thought and feeling. Manifestations of them are in the Christmas crowds, the people going and coming home, thrilling with pleasant anticipations, in the gleaming windows of dwelling and store, displays of toys and timely merchandise and Christmas trees. All these arouse no response in the coldly and callously selfish, the unbelieving, those who hold themselves apart from and superior to their fellows. They are developed to noble uses and power by the most intricate and complicated and mysterious of all machinery, ready always for the service of all of us—the familiar strangely combined, interlocking, interwoven, organization of soul, emotion, reason, passions, will, conscience, existing within each of us. However poor or rich, weak or strong, high or lowly, we may be, each of us has the privilege of developing, knowing, sharing, the splendor and sweetness of the ineffable radiance in which the everlasting promise was chanted by the legions in the sky to the lonely and humble shepherds. The simplest of us, the mentally restricted to whom the ample page of knowledge is not unfolded, the most brilliantly endowed and elaborately taught, alike may apply this wonderful machinery. It is for each of us to determine whether we shall use or misuse or neglect.

Most of us are so fortunate as to know a few immeasurably powerful, far-reaching, human dynamos noiselessly, ceaselessly, bountifully, radiating the Christmas light that penetrates and permeates and illuminates and lives in and softens and uplifts hearts. They are comparatively few. The world would be incalculably better with more of them. Any of us may become one of them, and so achieve the real and supreme purpose and end of life. We can do it now by drawing into ourselves from all about us and concentrating, consecrating and freely disseminating the true meaning and teaching of the season and the event to the honoring and commemoration of which it is dedicated.

It is craven evasion to measure what we may do and give at Christmas time by the money we have, be it much or scanty. We see lavish spending mere waste, unnecessary, often unwelcome, heaping of luxury on abundance; Christmas giving desecrated to ostentations and gratification of vanity; far worse, gifts bestowed as investments, with mean and sordid calculation on larger returns. Christmas opulence need not be a matter of dollars. The richest gifts sometimes are from dire poverty. No gift can be more precious or valuable or enduring than living and constant example and daily and hourly evidences of kindliness and affection, of the strength and courage that make patience in face of stinging provocations or under lash of sorrows, troubles, deprivations, disappointments. Solomon, who had the wisdom of common sense and intimate observation of human nature and affairs, described the simple word, costing nothing but spoken in right conditions, as like apples of gold, things of huge wealth and lasting, glittering beauty. The certain poor widow modestly casting in her mite, won loving and endless honor from the Son of the Almighty God and Creator. A word, look, smile, an intonation of voice, a gesture, a very small gift, help in need, rendered, maybe, without much exertion or expenditure—any of these, expressing the kindliness, the gentle mercy for frailties, the deep and cordial sympathy with sorrow and misfortune belonging with Christmas—may live in far-reaching good and far-spread beneficence long after we are gone. Any of them may comfort and cleanse and inspire hearts all through the coming new year and other years to the end of time and generations.

We may not know. It is not decreed that we should know. Hopes and aspirations and higher and finer impulses, cravings, aspirations, any of these may be from word or act or example of a forgotten saint, or preacher or obscure servant of God a century, five centuries, ten centuries, in the past. Perhaps very rarely, or never, we see results from the good we do, or try to do. Bread we cast upon the waters may nourish far from us those of whom we know nothing, in circumstances and places we do not imagine, and it may not return to us this side of the final accounting and review, when approval and blessing of the Father are revealed. Burdens lifted from the weary and heavy laden make lighter the loads we must bear and easier and swifter our upward climbing. Tears we prevent bring blossoming of beauty and fragrance to our souls. Dark, affrighting, clouds enveloping others and swept away by our friendly aid will pour fourth genial sunshine to soothe our griefs and banish our fears. The light and love and hope and helpfulness we radiate from the holiness and solemn joyousness of Christmas—the Holy Day, of the Christ who lived and taught and suffered and knew the pains of dreadful death for us—may carry the radiance and guidance and inspiration of the Annunciation to many and through the distant future. We may not know of that. We do know that our striving to spread what we gather to us of the Christmas atmosphere will not be lost nor forgotten, that the light and help we try faithfully and lovingly to give will shine and be with us to the end here and surely in the hereafter. When our last Christmas has gone by and we hear the call for departure we will see the pathway into the darkness behind which we know redemption is accomplished and reward for humble, trustful, loyal endeavor awaits, shine before us, broad, clear, sparkling and beautiful as the silver track of the full moon across the bosom of a placid lake.

We cannot stay here. We can live to our appointed times, and while we live love and see and do. We can be dynamos, taking and giving forth the gloriously beautiful meaning and teaching and purpose of Christmas, spreading happiness all about us and so have our own souls bask in the full glory of it and feel, to our innermost beings, all its joys and pleasures and hopes.

Alfred B. Williams.

Christmas Meditation

On the summit of the ages that reach out into Eternity's silence, stands Christ, the Light of the world (St. John 17:5). The Shechinah glory of that Light, in the Star, led the Wise Men to the Bethlehem shrine of the King of Kings. That Light, lighteth every man that cometh into the world.

At this season of His Incarnation, "O come, let us adore Him, Christ, the Lord."—V. A. G.

Once More the Blessed Christmastide

Dear Friend:

Does this Christmas find you just a bit more lonely than the last?—a bit more weary on life's road? Are home and all its treasures far away? Have dear ones left you for the Father's House? Do those who yet remain love and understand you less because you love Him more? Are Satan's darts more fiery for your devotion to God's Word? —his persecutions fiercer for your faithful zeal for Christ? Are there heavier conflicts, heavier burdens to be borne—and heavier heartaches?

Dear Child of God!—For you, then, may this Christmas bring peculiar joy. For know, by all these tokens, that your Redemption draweth nigh. He who came of old a Babe is coming back as King! Rejoice, Rejoice! The Star of Bethlehem brings promise that the Daystar soon will dawn!—Agnes Scott Kent.

The Purpose of the Church

By the Right Reverend Charles Palmeston Anderson, D. D.

(Adress delivered by the Presiding Bishop at Brooklyn Academy of Music, on December 9, 1929.)

WHAT is the mission of the Church in the World? What is the purpose for which it exists? If we were to examine the charters of incorporated societies in our several states we would find that the objectives and purposes of such societies were stated in their charters. The Church has a charter. The purpose of the Church is stated in the charter. "Go into all the world." That includes Long Island, though Long Island, of course, is not the whole world. Go into all the world and preach the Gospel, evangelize, make disciples, make Christians, baptizing them, receiving them into the Christian fellowship, making them members of the body of Christ, teaching them about God and His love and purpose, about man and his high calling in Christ Jesus, teaching them to do whatsoever things I have commanded and "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world." That is the purpose of the Church. It is to make disciples of Christ.

The primary purpose of the Church is not to build churches and parish houses and rectories. These are admirable means to an end, but no end in themselves. The primary purpose of the Church is not even to build hospitals and homes and benevolent institutions. These all come along naturally and inevitably as the fruit and product of religion; but if we undertake to gather the fruits while neglecting the roots, the fruits will soon shrivel and decay. The primary purpose of the Church is not the multiplication of parochial and diocesan organizations. It is quite possible to have too many organizations and too little organization. It is easy to have so many organizations that one cannot see the woods for the trees.

There is only one organization with which the Church is primarily concerned and that is the Church itself. It is both an organization and an organism. All other organizations are auxiliary and contributory to the parent organization. If they do not strengthen the parents organization, they should be abandoned. Organization itself is a means to an end. The primary purpose of the Church is to make disciples, to make Christian boys and girls, Christian men and women, Christian homes. To reach out and penetrate society so that society shall be Christian in its structure and principles, to reach out into the world of business and commerce, to establish the Golden Rule and to try to bring it about that business ethics and Christian ethics shall not be divorced from each other, to reach out even into the world of politics which has always been so remote and inaccessible, and to try to make it clear that there is no department of human activity from which the Christian disciple can detach himself from his religion. In a word the purpose of the Church is to make personal disciples of Christ, to bring them into the fellowship of the Church, to set them to work as leaven until the leaven leaveneth the whole of society and the kingdoms of this world become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ.

That is the program. We cannot do it all at once. It takes centuries to do things; but we can begin at the beginning and travel in the right direction.

How do we set about to create this personal discipleship? In the last analysis it is by imparting the knowledge of the one God as He is made known in the person of Jesus Christ. That is where Christianity begins. That is our goal. Whether we are teaching little children to lisp the Lord's Prayer, or teaching them their duty towards God and their neighbor, or teaching them the meaning of worship and sacraments, or having them prepared for confirmation and first communion, or serving on a vestry, or on some organization whose activities are related to human welfare, or carrying out an every member canvass, or giving money to the parish and the diocese and to the Church at large, or endeavoring to better social conditions, or help backward peoples—all these converge at a single point, that boys and girls and men and women may learn to know and love God and serve Him through Christ and His Church. That is the way disciples have always been made. That was the way St. Paul, the great missionary Apostle made converts. His message to the non-Christian world could be summed up in two sentences. "Him whom ye ignorantly worship Him declare I unto you." "God is in Christ reconciling the world to Himself." When that message was first proclaimed the world began to be changed. It was not changed all at once. It has not been completely changed yet; but it began to be changed. Liberty, fraternity and equality began to be born. "Ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make ye free." "God has made of one blood all nations of men to dwell on the face of the whole earth." "In Christ Jesus there is neither Jew nor Greek, Barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free." Those doctrines, were Revolutionary spiritual forces. When that message was delivered, slavery began to be abolished. It took a long time and it is not completely abolished yet; but one cannot indoctrinate men and women with the gospel of human brotherhood without creating a state of mind in which slavery becomes impossible. When that message was delivered, war started out on its long, long journey towards extinction. It is not extinguished yet, far from it. Do not delude yourselves, but the fact that so much has been accomplished in our times along the lines of a formulated and articulated internationalism and the fact that our own beloved country has joined with so many others in outlawing war, show that the world does move and that much progress is being made in the direction of peace under the pressure of the religious conscience.

When the gospel message began to be spread over the world guilds and crafts and brotherhoods and sisterhoods and schools and benevolent institutions began to be born. For you cannot indoctrinate people with the gospel of Him who said, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these ye have done it unto me" without creating a passion for human welfare. When Christ's gospel began to be preached men acquired higher ideals of home and wife and child and mother and honor and purity and chivalry. We have not entirely lived up to those ideals but it is something nevertheless to have ideals. When Christ's gospel began to be preached men and women in the depths of sin and hopelessness began to realize that they could be born again and make a fresh start in the Kingdom of God and stand erect upon their feet amongst people of God.

These things were not all done at once. They have not been completely done yet. The Kingdom of God has not fully arrived. It is in the process of beginning, but that which gave punch to progress was the glorious gospel of the blessed God.

Human progress is not something which is inevitable. It only comes about by human endeavor working along right lines. Progress is not something that is guaranteed by evolution. Evolution is the story of ups and downs, of survivals and extinctions. Progress is not assured through the marvelous inventions and discoveries of our wonderful century. These may be turned to men's good or to man's destruction. Human progress consists in an increased ability to receive and transmit Truth, Beauty and Goodness. These are the attributes of God. Jesus Christ was their greatest exponent. So it is that the Church in spite of many failings and set-backs has been identified with those things that pertain to human welfare so long as She has been true to Him who is the Way, the Truth and the Life. We bask in the sunshine of a civilization that is at least partly Christian. We have inherited more than we have acquired. It is a fair question as to whether we are going to hand down to posterity as much as our ancestors have handed down to us.

Who are charged with the responsibility of going into all the world and making disciples? At this point I come up against a pernicious heresy which is having a deadening influence on the spiritual vitality of the Church. It is not so much a heresy in doctrine as a heresy in practice. It is this: When I ask who is charged with the responsibility of bringing men to Christ through the Church, many of you would answer that that is the work of the clergy. Of course it is, but it is not theirs exclusively. It is no more a minister's work than a layman's. I hold exalted views about the Christian ministry, about the episcopate and priesthood of the Church. Nevertheless, the clergy are not the Church. The Episcopal Church stands for law and order. Like St. Paul, it is a stickler for organization. It is not a Church wherein every man can be a law unto himself. That leads to chaos. There are some things that only bishops can do; some things that only priests can do; some things that only vestries can do. Back of these special duties and responsibilities lies the corporate responsibility of the Church, which is the common responsibility of all of us, clergy and laity alike.

If I had to distinguish between the function of the clergy and laity, I might say that it was the special function of the laity to convert people and the function of the clergy to sustain and edify and employ those whom the laity had converted, though, of course, the laity can have no monopoly in the blessed privilege of converting souls.

The word laity is often used in a purely negative sense. A layman is a man who is not a member of some group in counter-distinction from those who are members of that group. I am a layman in the presence of doctors, lawyers and bankers; but surely that does not cover the whole ground. Surely the laity of the Church are not willing to be described as negative quantities, simple men who do not belong to the ranks of the clergy. The word laity has a positive spiritual meaning. It is used in the Old Testament in a very conspicuous place. It was on the occasion of giving the Ten Commandments, the moral law, to the world; and God said, "If ye will keep these commandments and these ordinances which I have given ye, I shall be your God and ye shall be my laity" (or "people", as it is in the familiar version). The implication is that if the laity do not promote the Kingdom of God that He will not be their God and they shall not be His laity.

"Go into all the world and make disciples and, lo, I am with you even unto the end of the world." The implication is that if we are not making disciples, He will not be with us to the end of the world. Over against the laity, in Old Testament language who were the people of God, were the gentes, those who were thwarting the purpose of God. The function of the laity, God's people, was to convert those who were enemies of the Kingdom.

The part of the Church building which the laity occupy is the nave. The word nave comes from navis, a ship. One of the early fathers of the Church described the Church as a ship. The Bishop was the Captain. Priests were under him in rank and responsibility. Deacons had their assignments. Where did the laity come in? The laity were at the oars. This illustration was used long before the days of turbine steamers when tiers of oarsmen bent their backs to propel the ship through the resisting waters. You who live so near the ocean must know that a ship cannot be steered unless it is in motion. The motion depends on the people at the oars. The Presiding Bishop cannot steer the Church if it has no wind in its sails and no power in its machinery. The Bishop cannot steer the diocese. The parish priest cannot steer the parish unless they are in motion and the motion depends on the laity who are in pews, or who ought to be, and who have the oars in their hands.

What instrumentalities can the laity use in making disciples and adding to the Lord daily such as are being saved?

First and foremost the irresistible influence of an exemplary consistent life. When men see the estimate that we put upon spiritual values; when our religion centers at the Altar and radiates through our whole life; when we are staunchly identified with the good and great causes to which the Church is committed, when we let our light so shine before men that they may see our good works; they will want to come into the fellowship.

Second, The home must always be the source to which the Church looks for recruits. Nothing can supersede it. The home was the first church, the first school, the first government. All the churches and schools and governments that have come into being do not relieve parents of the responsibilities nor deprive them of the joys of the home. A great injustice has been done to the youth of our day in censuring them for things for which the older generation is responsible.

Third, Another instrument that lies ready to hand for the laity is to invite people to the work and worship and fellowship of the Church and to see to it that it is a real loving fellowship. This is the evangelistic method. It may take on a hundred forms. It covers all the ground from street preaching which many of our laymen might well do to the quiet invitation to our friends and neighbors to share in a religion from which we derive so much satisfaction.

Fourth. Another instrument for furthering the Kingdom is prayer. "Thy Kingdom come" is the prayer that our Lord put upon our lips. The Church cannot make headway without prayer. Do you know how reinforcing it is to me to have the assurance of the prayers of many people in the new responsibilities that have been placed upon me. I could not contemplate these responsibilities with any peace of mind or with any hope or buoyancy if I did not have the prayers of the clergy and laity of the Church. Pray for the Church. Stop arguing about it and begin praying for it. Pray for its bishops and other clergy. Pray for its missionary agencies and for its missionaries. Pray for its National Council.

Fifth. There is still another means for spreading the Kingdom, which our laity have in abundance. It is money. The Church cannot get on without money any more than any other organization. This conundrum was once given to me. What goes when the Church goes, stops when the Church stops, is no use to the Church; but the Church cannot get on without it? The answer is "Money". Money goes when the Church goes. When the Church is really alive, when spiritual experiences are going on within men's souls, when they are finding peace and joy in believing, they are moved naturally and spontaneously to give freely and cheerfully to express their gratitude for what God has done for them. Money stops when the Church stops. When the Church is lethargic and indifferent and worldly and merely respectable and wasting time over inconsequential matters the money stops. Money in itself is no use to the Church. All the gold in the world by itself would not advance the Kingdom of God any more than a hammer and saw by themselves could build a house. Nevertheless the Church cannot get on without it. On the face of it it must be apparent to every person who stops to think that the Church cannot carry on its work—evangelistic, educational, humanitarian—in all parts of the world as well as at home, often amongst backward peoples and in pioneer places without vast sums of money; and when so much money is being spent on the things that lie on the circumference, on chewing gum and candy and cigarettes and cigars and cosmetics and a hundred other things, surely the Church is justified in the name of God and humanity in asking for millions for those purposes that directly pertain to human welfare.

Our National Council meets on Wednesday of this week. It must take one of three courses—go forward, stand still, or go backwards. It looks now as if it might have to go backwards. Will the laity of the Church allow this?

I happen to be a football fan. I hope it is not incompatible with episcopal dignity. I love the team work. We need team work in the Church—a long pull, and a strong pull, and a pull altogether. This is no time for one to be pulling in one direction and another in an opposite direction. There is too much at stake. Stand back of your parish church. Make it possible to do its own work well, but do not allow it to exhaust all its energy in maintaining its own structure. That would be like a football player who sacrifices victory for his team and college for his own personal glory. Stand back of the Bishop of Long Island and the splendid things that he is trying to do. I won't say stand back of me. That would be too personal; but stand back of the whole Church and its well conceived program, which has had the sanction of the whole Church.

A Christmas Message

Erroll Hay Colcock.

A-down the vista of the years,
Tonight, oh, may you see
A simple shrine where shepherds fall
On reverent, bended knee,
To worship there the Blessed Babe,
Beside the Virgin mild,
Who bends in wond'ring mother-love
Above her Holy Child.

Far back across the span of years,
Of ages long gone by,
May you behold a Light that gleams
Within the eastern sky—
The radiant Star of Bethlehem,
That shines as Wise Men bring
Rare gifts, when to the manger led,
Unto their New-Born King.

Across the silence of the years,
Of ages long since gone,
Oh, may you hear the angel host
That sang that Christmas morn;
As now unto the listening world
They seem to sing again:
"All glory be to God on high,
And peace, good-will towards men!"

Favorite Scripture Verse

(In this space each week will appear a favorite passage of Scripture as sent in by a different reader. Every one is, therefore, invited to send us their favorite verse. It is suggested all who can, join with the rest of us in committing to memory the verse which appears here each week, including its location in the Holy Book; and in due time your memory chest will be laden with choice, eternal treasures, indeed. "Thy word have I hid in my heart, that I might not sin against thee." Ps. 119:11.)

This week the following verse was submitted by Mrs. J. H. Oortwyn, of Los Angeles, California:

"It is better to trust in the Lord than to put confidence in man" (Psalms 118:8—the middle verse of the Bible).

Who will send one from the far-away places as well as very near us?

The New Humanity

By the Venerable F. W. Neve, D. D.

Archdeacon of the Blue Ridge.

PART IV.

Where Are the Sons of God?

THE SON OF GOD became the Son of Man in order that He might make the sons of men, the Sons of God; this necessarily meant the promotion of the sons of men to a far higher level than they had ever occupied before.

For by uniting His Nature to our own, He made it possible for our nature to share in privileges and powers which were not natural to man, and could only be shared in by us through our union with Him.

For example, on one occasion, He said to His disciples: "I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly." This He further illustrated in the Parable of the Vine, the night before His death, when He said: "I am the Vine, ye are the branches." This makes clear the fact of our union with Him, and our share in His divine life, without which all spiritual life and growth and fruitfulness would be impossible.

This made a new beginning in the life of humanity, for a share in the divine nature had never been given to man, and man could never have attained to it, if the Son of God had not become Man. He shared our nature with us, in order that we might share His nature with Him.

This necessarily meant a New Humanity and Christ made this perfectly clear in His reference on one occasion to John the Baptist: "Among them that are born of women there hath not arisen a greater than John the Baptist, but he that is least in the Kingdom of heaven is greater than he." The Sons of God are greater in position and privilege than the sons of men, because they share in the divine nature. There is, too, a clear and emphatic recognition of the exalted position and privileges of the Sons of God, in these other words of our Lord: "Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that believeth on me, the works that I do shall he do also, and greater works than these shall he do, because I go unto my Father."

Further light is thrown on this passage by the words of Christ, before His Ascension, when He told His disciples that they were to wait at Jerusalem till they were endued with power from on high, which came to pass when they were filled with the Holy Ghost on the Day of Pentecost. They could not do His works, unless they were filled with His Spirit.

To be "filled with the Spirit", "to walk in the Spirit", "to be led by the Spirit", were marks by which the Sons of God were distinguished from the sons of men, and this matter is summed up in the words of St. John, where he says: "If any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of His." Starting out, then, as the Sons of God; sharing in the Divine Nature; filled with power from on high, even the power of the Divine Spirit, with the assurance that they would share with Christ in His mighty works, it may well be asked: Where are the Sons of God now?

If, when nothing more than a despised sect, persecuted and trampled on by the power of Rome, they succeeded in bringing the greatest empire that the world had ever seen to terms, one would have naturally thought that they would now be ruling the world.

For the New Testament clearly indicates that Christ intended to create a new humanity, as St. Paul bears witness: "If any man be in Christ he is a new creature (or a new creation); old things are passed away; behold all things are become new." And again: "Put on the new men which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness."

The Sons of God, as members of the new humanity, ought to be, now as then, on a higher plane than the sons of men and be able to exercise a greater power and influence over human affairs. But is there any marked and convincing evidence that such is the case? The late Harold Begbie, in his well known book, "Painted Windows", commences the last chapter with the words: "It is curious, if Christianity is from heaven, that it exercises so little power in the affairs of the human race." This, it may be said, gives too pessimistic a view of the situation, but there is, nevertheless, truth in the words, especially when we compare them with what was said during the war, that "Christianity had never been tried."

Strange to say, the great men in these days, are the men who have made themselves, such as President Hoover, Edison and Henry Ford, who, beginning at the bottom of the ladder, have raised themselves by sheer ability to be leading citizens of this Great Republic. These are self-made men, and their achievements are all the more to their credit from the fact; but in the New Testament we are made acquainted with men, who from being humble fishermen on the Lake of Galilee, were raised to be the leaders of the greatest spiritual movement that the world has ever seen. They were not self-made men; so far from that their outstanding power and leadership were due not to mere natural ability, but to the transforming influence of Jesus Christ and the power and inspiration of the Holy Spirit.

And one would certainly imagine that the Sons of God with the wonderful possibilities involved in their union with God in Christ, would be able now as then to far outstrip any competitors, who relied only upon natural ability.

When we think, too, of the wonderful things which have been wrought by men of science for the benefit of their fellow men, from merely natural resources, the wonder grows as to what the Sons of God are doing to bless mankind from the infinite spiritual resources placed at their disposal for the enrichment of the world.

For St. Paul says in Rom. 8: "He that spared not His own Son but delivered Him up for us all, how shall He not, with Him, also freely give us all things?" which would seem to imply that the Sons of God are given access to the full extent of the divine resources, at any rate, so far as the spiritual world is concerned. The world is losing immeasurably from the apparent unconsciousness of the Sons of God of the power entrusted to them for the benefit of humanity. Spiritual power is the highest form of power known to man, and the failure by the Church to develop and make the most of the spiritual power placed at her disposal, has possibly resulted in the over-emphasis placed upon material things, and the lack of appreciation of her service to mankind by the modern world.

Apparently, there is no desire, or ambition on the part of professing Christians, as a rule, to become burning and shining lights in their day and generation; and the idea of being even suspected of aspiring to sainthood would probably bring forth indignant denials that such was the case. And yet it is quite evident from the New Testament, that it was just this very thing which the Church of Christ, in her first Days, was supposed to represent; though there were many who, through the weakness of the flesh, and the tremendous pressure of their heathen surroundings, failed to come up to it.

"Called to be saints," form part of the opening words of St. Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians, and it is perhaps the loss of this saintly ideal in the modern Church which goes far to account for its loss of power and influence on the world. It has been losing the salt, which was to sweeten human life, and redeem the world from corruption; and the Sons of God were to be, not then merely, but always, the light of the world, because they were to follow Christ so closely, that His Light would be reflected from them.

Is not the Church too content and well satisfied with the level of the sons of men, by requiring but little more than this from her members? Are the people taught to realize that they are Sons of God and are, therefore, part of a new and higher type of humanity?

Are they taught, too, that the Sons of God are in possession of powers which if developed and exercised would enable them to enrich the world as has been the case in numberless instances in the past? And that the possible extension of these higher powers by the Church might well surpass in importance to human progress any contribution which natural science can make to the good of mankind? And this is so because the Sons of God belong to the New Humanity, which means that they are so closely allied to the divine; that they can work on a higher plane than the sons of men and have at their disposal spiritual forces which transcend the merely natural and physical.

For they "walk in the Spirit," and are "filled with the Spirit," and are "led by the Spirit," in paths of knowledge and experience unknown to the natural man. For "the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him, neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned" (1 Cor. 2:15).

It may be said, however, that the saintly ideal has been in a measure marred, in our time by the pretensions of those who adopt an "holier than thou" attitude, accompanied by unlovely traits of character, which have repelled rather than attracted others to the saintly life. So that the word "saint" has come to have a very different meaning, in many cases, from what it originally held.

But a life of devotion to our Lord may and can be carried on without any pretension to sanctity, and in fact humility and unobtrusive goodness are of the essence of true saintliness. And perhaps the ideal which would appeal most powerfully to the spirit of our own times, would be the ideal of service. It is here that the Sons of God can perhaps best fulfil, in these days of ours, their high calling. The New Humanity, if it is to lead the way to new heights of spiritual adventure for God and men, can best do so in the Spirit of the Master, as revealed in His own words, which expressed the meaning and spirit of His whole life on earth: "For whether is greater, he that sitteth at meat, or he that serveth? is not he that sitteth at meat? but I am among you as he that serveth."

Studying the Ministry

By the Rev. S. S. Drury,
(Rector St. Paul's School, Concord, N. H.)

We hear much of studying for the ministry, not so much of studying the ministry. The latter should precede the former. A man may well make a close-up scrutiny of various careers before deciding in which to spend his life. The clergy and readers of Church papers know by now of the plans to conduct a study at St. Paul's School from January 3 to 6 for college men.

It is obvious that many noble and effective ministries are in the hands of non-college men. We would raise here no vital distinction between the A. B. and the not A. B. in connection with holy orders. But in our day so many men go to college that it seems fair to have a conference specifically for college men and recent graduates on the ministry. Who knows but what a seriously-minded collegian spending the above mentioned week end at St. Paul's School, fraternizing with experienced leaders, may solidify his hazy notions into a conviction. Acts of the will follow on prayer, conference, and a sense of need. We are told to lift up our hearts, not to trust to their floating skyward.

Do the clergy realize that the propagation of the ministry is part of the propagation of the Gospel? Some ministers are singularly lack-lustre in this matter of the supply of faithful and fit pastors. Themselves a bit disgruntled, they leave the filling of the vacancy inevitably to be caused by their own demise either to the Holy Spirit or to chance. Should not every man in orders raise up during his ministry at least one successor, so that the ranks will stand?

The most foolish comment made by the clergy about the ministry is that remark about keeping men out. It was first made more than half a century ago by a superbly rugged missionary-bishop, who, because of his indubitable structural contributions, could make it and could get away with it. He said it will be remembered that he didn't pride himself so much on the number of men he brought into the ministry as on the number he had kept out. Well and good.

No doubt he had painful data, and he said it, and he meant it. But on the lips of the average parson, "handsome and out of the wet," who smugly repeats the saying, it is an insipid excuse. We clergy should find no flattering unction in the thought of the two or three unfits whom we have persuaded away from the ministry; rather should we scrupulously and penitently meditate upon the number of fit men whom we have unconsciously kept out. The clergyman is sometimes the poorest advertisement for the clerical profession. And if he wants a humbling topic for his tomorrow morning's meditation, let it be: How many ready and idealistic young servants of God have I by my pomposity, peevishness, mental dullness and moral dustiness, kept out of the ministry?

We ought to have—well, how many ought we to have at this conference from January 3 to 6? It will be interesting to note the response of the Church. The Episcopal Church with its "thousand members at Yale" and equal numbers in other places of light and leading occupies on paper a position of great leadership. When are we going to transfer our paper leadership into practical discipleship?

The Unspeakable Gift

Christmas! The season of glad giving! What gift, dear friend, would you desire? You have but to claim whatsoe'er you will, for in Him, the Unspeakable Gift, all things are yours. Eternal life, grace, glory, reviving, rest, victory, peace, joy, wisdom, strength, power the supply of every need, the desires of our heart: all these and more He gives. What do you lack? Oh, let us lack no more! Rather, let us take lavishly, as He bestows lavishly. Let us live no longer poor, shrunken, withered lives, but let us live gloriously the "life abundant"—possessing our possessions, claiming our citizenship, honoring our high calling as sons and daughters of the Heavenly King.—Agnes Scott Kent.

Do Not Take Christ Out of Christmas

(The Richmond Times-Dispatch carried the following abbreviation of a sermon preached by the Reverend O. A. Sauer, rector of Bethlehem Lutheran Church, Richmond, Virginia.)

"A Christmas without Christ in the heart—is an empty thing.

"Let homes and friends be merry; let the children enjoy their gifts and blow their trumpets and beat their drums; let the Christmas tree be admired; but it is all vanity if we take Christ out of Christmas.

"The Christmas story is a wonderful story. It is meant for all people and hence also for us. Let us embrace the Christ-child as He comes to us anew in His word with good will from Heaven and with peace to sinful men. He comes to bless us with forgiveness of sin, life and salvation. Rejoice! We helpless creatures have been helped; we lost sinners have been redeemed.

" 'Glory to God in the highest.' To God belongs the glory for having devised the marvelous plan by which our souls have been saved from the death into which sin had plunged us; He so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law; to Him belongs the praise forever. In this Holy Child Jesus, God is reconciled and the guilty souls finds peace in believing. And now there is peace on earth. The barrier between God and man is taken away; the condemnation that was upon us is removed; the soul that believes in Jesus has peace. Unto us a Saviour is born and our hearts can find rest in Him, because there is now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus. And all this blessedness is the gift of divine grace. Not because there was any worthiness in man did God send His dear Son, but only because He loved us so.

"The Christ-child is a wonderful and glorious Child. He was the Son of God as well as the Son of Mary. The Babe for whom there was no room in the inn and who was laid in the manger was God over all, blessed forever. Divinity did not cease to exist when the divine person was born into the world as a human child. He was God then as He had been before and shall forever be. He only assumed the human nature in addition to the divine nature which He had from eternity, so that He who was God before His conception and birth was now God and man in one undivided person. Among men this birth excited little attention, but it was a marvelous birth, at which the heavens were stirred, and at which the world rejoices today. For what the prophet Isaiah declared was now fulfilled: 'Unto us a Child is born, unto us a Son is given; and the government shall be upon His Shoulder; and He shall be called Wonderful, Counselor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace.' The Babe of Bethlehem is our Lord and our God, who for our salvation has become our brother."

Carol

Elizabeth Carrington Eggleston.

Oh, Mary went a-journeying upon a winter's day,
She sang sweet alleluiahs to ease the weary way.
And as she sang the birds came back and joined in her song,
And flowers sprang beneath her feet the weary way along.

They sang of Christ the Saviour,
God's only Son was He,
They sang of Christ the Saviour,
Who came to set us free.

Oh, Mary sat a-resting upon a winter's night,
The Christ-child lay upon her breast, and on her face a light.
The wise men brought Him gifts of gold, and frankincense, and myrrh,
The shepherds brought Him little lambs, and kneeled before her.

They worshipped Christ the Saviour,
A baby boy was He,
They worshipped Christ the Saviour,
Who came to set us free.

So all good folk and gentlemen do sing this song of joy,
Of Mary and the Christ-child, Who came a baby boy,
Who grew to strength and nobleness, and died to set us free,
A carpenter in Nazareth—a mighty King was He.

Bethlehem's Babe---The Lord of History

By Bishop W. A. Candler

THE INCARNATION, begun by the Advent of Jesus into the world at His birth in Bethlehem and perpetuated by His Resurrection from the dead and Ascension to the right hand of God on high, is the supreme event in human history.

To it all ancient history tended as a divinely directed movement leading to a heavenly end; and from it, as its starting point, modern history begins and advances with a superhuman momentum.

The folding doors of the history of mankind are inscribed respectively "Before Christ" and "After Christ." The ancient world fell asleep by His cradle and the modern world awaked with Him from the grave.

It is worse than folly for our age, so impatient with things supernatural, to object to the Incarnation, because of its miraculous nature. All history is miraculous, whether it be present or past history. The hand of the Invisible and Eternal God is manifest throughout all the pages of it, and amidst it all walks One whose "form is like the Son of God."

Events have not fallen out in a purposeless and haphazard fashion, but they have marched from the beginning as an army under the rule of a Divine Commander and Director; and the cause of Christ is the object of His divine care.

Horace Bushnell, in his great work entitled "Nature and the Supernatural," spoke no more than the truth which must be obvious to every interested student of history when he said: "We turn ourselves to the courses and grand events of human history, all that we include in the providential history of the world—the wars, diplomacies, emigrations, revolutions, discoveries and scientific developments of the world—and we are immediately met by some wonderful consent or understanding between Christianity and the Providential course of things. Christianity is in form the Supernatural Kingdom and working of God in the earth. It begins with a supernatural advent of divinity and closes with a supernatural exit of divinity; and the divine Visitant thus entered into the world, and going out from it, is himself a divine miracle in His own person; His works are miracles and His doctrine quite as truly, and the whole transaction taken as a movement on the world, or in it, not of it, supposes in fact a new and superior kind of administration, instituted by God Himself."

The skeptical Renan, despite his bias of doubt, expresses the same truth concerning the person and power of Jesus, saying: "The memory of His life has been like the perfume of another world, and all history is incomprehensible without Him."

A mere perfume, however, with its fleeting fragrance, does not adequately express the influence of the Babe of Bethlehem, the Man of Galilee. History is indeed incomprehensible without Him, not because its pages are scented with the odor of His sanctity, but because it is dominated by the strength of His power. His force is not a vague matter of "sweetness and light"; it is the omnipotent energy of One who is Mighty to save.

Years ago the learned Dr. Philip Schaff said:

> "Jesus of Nazareth, without money and arms, conquered more millions than Alexander, Caesar, Mohammed and Napoleon; without science and learning, He shed more light on things human and divine, than all the philosophers and scholars combined; without the eloquence of the school, He spoke words of life such as were never spoken before, nor since, and produced effects which lie beyond the reach of orator or poet; without writing a single line, He has set more pens in motion and furnished themes for more sermons, orations, discussions, works of art, learned volumes, and sweet songs of praise than the whole army of great men of ancient and modern times. Born in a manger and crucified as a malefactor, He now controls the destinies of the civilized world, and rules a spiritual empire which embraces one-third of the inhabitants of the globe."

Jesus has achieved all these results by His saving power in individual souls. He never proposed to lift humanity in bulk, or to save mankind in mass by any mundane mechanics of political legislation or schemes of social reformation. Over one penitent soul He rejoices as a father is made glad by the return of a prodigal son who was lost and is found and who was dead and is alive again.

The power of Jesus in history arises from the influence of an Ever Living Person over the souls of redeemed persons. They live because He lives, and the force of His life in them colors and controls the current of human history. This was the conclusion of Napoleon Bonaparte, when reflecting upon the subject during his exile in the island of St. Helena. Count Monthelon records that on one occasion the great Corsican inquired, "Can you tell me who Jesus Christ was?" and when a negative answer was given to his question, he said:

> "Well, then, I will tell you. Alexander, Caesar, Charlemagne, and I myself have founded great empires; but upon what did these creations of our genius depend? Upon force. Jesus alone founded His empire upon love, and to this very day millions would die for Him. . . . I think I understand something of human nature; and I tell you, all these were men, and I am a man: none else is like Him; Jesus Christ was more than man. . . . I have inspired multitudes with such an enthusiastic devotion that they would have died for me, . . . but to do this it was necessary that I should be visibly present with the electric influence of my looks, of my words, of my voice. When I saw men and spoke to them, I lighted up the flame of self-devotion in their hearts. . . . Christ alone has succeeded in so raising the mind of man towards the Unseen, that it becomes insensible to the barriers of time and space. Across a chasm of eighteen hundred years, Jesus Christ makes a demand which is beyond all others difficult to satisfy; He asks for that which a philosopher may often seek in vain at the hands of his friends, or a father of his children, or a bride of her spouse, or a man of his brother. He asks for the human heart; He will have it entirely to Himself. He demands it unconditionally; and forthwith His demand is granted. Wonderful! In defiance of time and space, the soul of man, with all its powers and faculties, becomes an annexation to the empire of Christ. All who sincerely believe in Him, experience that remarkable supernatural love towards Him. This phenomenon is unaccountable; it is altogether beyond the scope of man's creative powers. Time, the great destroyer, is powerless to extinguish this sacred flame; time can neither exhaust its strength, nor put a limit to its range. This is it which strikes me most; I have often thought of it. This it is which proves to me quite convincingly the Divinity of Jesus Christ."

Jesus Christ is the Lord of history because He is and, ever will be, the Saviour of sinful souls. He reigns by saving. He is the Prince of Life, because He alone has power to raise dead souls to life and cause them to know the "life that is hid with him in God." "Neither is there salvation in any other; for there is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved" (Acts 4:12).

The Christ of Bethlehem's Manger is the fulfillment of "the hope of Israel"—the most radiant and entrancing hope that ever enthralled the imagination and preserved the existence of any nation. He also is the hope which assures the welfare of all mankind in the future.

The triumphs of Jesus throughout all history are miracles which are more impressive than the Star which led the "Wise Men of the East" to his cradle. They are luminaries, radiant above the movements of all the centuries, declaring His deity as they shine, and attesting His as the full and final revelation of God to men.

There is no reason for either desire or hope that any other will come from heaven to show a sinful world a better way of life than that which He has opened before it. "Christ no after age shall e'er outgrow."

We cannot at this point in the world's history send to Him even the inquiry of the Baptist, "Art thou he that should come, or do we look for another?" It is too late for another to come. If another should come, all the presumptions would be against Him, and He would stand no chance in a contest with Jesus for the acceptance of mankind. "It were easier to untwist all the beams of light in the sky, separating and expunging one of the colors, than to get the character of Jesus out of the world!" If Jesus be not God, He who is God has waited too long to come to the earth to make His coming now worthwhile. The race of man would now meet Him with fierce indignation or languid indifference, declaring "hope deferred hath made the heart sick"—too sick for healing or for love. If Jesus be not God, He who is God has lost his chance with men.

He has disappointed the past, the world forces of the present are bent away from Him, and the future is irretrievably lost to Him. Jesus has shut up the world, when the case eventually reaches its final issue, to atheism or faith in Him, because the world's history has no centre nor purpose, if it is not organized around Him.

RELIGION IN SOVIET RUSSIA: By William Chauncey Emhardt, D. D. Cloth. Pp. 386. Published by The Morehouse Publishing Company, Milwaukee, Wis. Price, $4.00.

Dr. Emhardt can speak with authority, because of his constant contacts with the elements that go to make the push of Bolshevism in this country a factor of no minor account. He knows what he is talking about, and brings an array of data that is indisputable.

Apart from the fact that "world revolution" is the undisguised purpose of Bolshevism and is slowly creeping into our commonwealth, the supreme concern is the religious aspect of the problem. Granted that the Tzarist regime with the political supremacy of the State Church, could bring to birth a monster like Rasputin and that in the wake of that cruel period of the history of Russia, education was withheld from the people and the palpable intent was to keep the population sodden in ignorance for the better exploitation of their labor and their lives, there is no rational ground for the terrible regime now operating in the relentless crusade to crush religion utterly and to give the emancipated Russians no food for their hungry souls. It would seem as though the old axiom, "Whom the gods would destroy, they first make man", holds in this instance. For nothing short of insanity can lie beneath this cruel movement. The martyrdom of five thousand priests; many of them buried alive; gouging out the eyes of the Archbishop of Perm, cutting off his hands and then after being carried about his city, thrown into the river; Bishop Ambrosius dragged to his death tied to the tail of a wild horse; Bishop Isador impaled; Bishop Plato drenched with water and left in zero weather to become a frozen statue; the population rising in pleading for the life of the much-loved Bishop Benjamin, being swept by machine guns; these and much of the like make the story of the Soviet attitude towards religion.

We once thought that renegade Jews were at the bottom of this movement, but such is not the case. Very few Jews have any influence in this realm of hatred and dastardly connivance. But we do know that the aim is to get the children from under the influence of parents who yet have some spark of religious feeling. And in this sphere of operation the greatest danger lies. A nation of atheists flooding the world, bearing scientific culture and artistic charm, must in time bear dire fruitage.

Dr. Emhardt exposes the intriguing movement, hiding under the mask of the so-called "Living Church," by means of which interference with the affairs of the Church in foreign countries, notably in our own, became and still is, an aggravating menace to Russians of pious thought and practice. Tracing with accuracy throughout the entire volume the various pathways of this anti-religious propaganda, he brings us at the conclusion the strong conviction of one who would arouse an indifferent Christianity to a sense of this universal wrong.

TALKING WITH GOD. Edited by Alfred Franklin Smith. Cloth. Pp. 151. Published by The Cokesbury Press. Nashville, Tennessee. Price, 50c.

This "manual of prayers for all occasions" invites us to the much needed consideration of the right vehicle for the expression of our thoughts Godward. The title is suggestive. For praying is not saying prayers; but sincerely talking with God. There will be those who will urge that the caption is a contradiction of the purpose of the book. For talking with God should not require any set form of words. And cultured saints come eventually to get beyond the props of any such formularies. Yet, the rank and file of believers do stand in want of some adequate way of telling their inner thoughts to the Heavenly Father.

In this volume the range of petition, penitence, praise, communion, adoration and worship is wide and varied. Of the denominations there are representative men and women of the Presbyterian, Methodist, Baptist, Congregational, Episcopal, United Brethren, Lutheran, Evangelical, Church of Christ, United Church of Canada, Epworth League, university, college and seminary leaders, editors, conference directors and other officials; and two prayers are here from Jewish rabbis. The subjects are inviting and applicative. A topical and also a personal index are appended, which add much to the worth of the book.

LAY READERS.

Mr. Editor:

Knowing some of the sacrifices which Lay Readers gladly make in order to "lend a hand," and knowing, too, how small a percentage of "good Church people" hereabouts realize and appreciate what Lay Readers do, I wonder if the same attitude exists in the Southern States. In some dioceses in England and in Canada Lay Readers have Official Badges, wearing them when conducting or assisting in Divine Service, denoting that these members of the Laity have been chosen and have been given authority to do such work. Unfortunately, however, the custom does not prevail in all dioceses; all do not show even this slight recognition of services willingly rendered. There is a recognized form of Service for admitting and licensing Lay Readers. Generally speaking, the clergy value the assistance given by Lay Readers in maintaining the Church's services, but I am positive that the average Layman could give a good deal more consideration to so important a matter.

ENCOURAGEMENT.

Mr. Editor:

Today I am enclosing my subscription for another year. I was so pleased the day Mr. Augreal called telling me about our Southern Churchman. Every time I go over them there is a new help. It is men like you that will put the world as far ahead spiritually in the next hundred years as we are physically ahead now, compared with a hundred years past. I can just feel the desire you have to benefit mankind.

OLD PRAYER BOOKS.

Mr. Editor:

Next to the Bible I have always placed our Book of Common Prayer as the most valuable and helpful to humanity. What to do with the thousands of copies of this valuable book now displaced by the revised Prayer Book is a problem I have locally solved in a way that I believe can be of widespread value.

After consultation with the heads of two institutions a supply of old Prayer Books has been placed in each with a neat little card stating, For Free Distribution—Take One.

The two institutions are the County Jail and the County Home—or Poorhouse. The long and lonely period of confinement causes men to read most anything that comes to hand. There is great consolation, comfort and help in the Prayer Book. There is no thought or suggestion of making Churchmen of the readers—only help for them.

Why can not clergymen or laymen having spiritual oversight of our Penitentiaries, Jails, Poorhouses, Seamen's Institutes, etc., see that supplies of old Prayer Books are thus placed and reserve supplies kept for replacements? I find men in Jail reading them with real interest.

Sidewalk Pulpit.

The New York Telegram recently carried the following account of how one clergyman is carrying out the command, "Go out into the highways and hedges and compel them to come in."

Taking the Gospel to Saturday shoppers and Sunday evening strollers, the Rev. Dr. Jeffrey Jennings, rector of the Episcopal Church of the Atonement, Brooklyn, has put in operation a permanent sidewalk pulpit in a busy section of that borough. The rector calls his parish "Brooklyn's Little Church Around the Corner," and plans as general a ministration as that carried on in the famous Manhattan Church which bears this name.

The pulpit was constructed by Joseph Penny, a trustee of the Atonement and the father of the eleven-year-old boy evangelist, Wilfred Penny. The rostrum is made of light gray brick. It will be used during fine weather each Sunday evening and Saturday evenings, when there is a large crowd of persons in this neighborhood who do their week-end shopping from the open markets along Fifth Avenue.

The Rev. J. J. D. Hall, known as the Bishop of Wall Street; Wilfred Penny, Doris Bussing, the seven-year-old girl evangelist, and other lay evangelists will be heard from time to time.

The Atonement outdoor pulpit is believed to be only one of its kind not only in Brooklyn, but on Long Island. There have been several portable and temporary pulpits out of doors, especially those used by the Brooklyn Federation of Churches during the summer months, but this particular pulpit is believed to be the only stationary outdoor pulpit.

Grace Episcopal Church, as well as the Cathedral of St. John the Divine and the First Presbyterian Church, all in Manhattan, have had permanent outside pulpits for years, but in each of these cases the pulpit is inside a large lawn, and not really "on the sidewalk."

With the advent of the Atonement pulpit other pastors are considering following the lead of Dr. Jennings in carrying the Gospel to the man in the street through the outdoor pulpit according to the command of Jesus, who said, "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel."

Dr. Lacey, rector of the Episcopal Church of the Redeemer, in a sermon some months ago, requested a donation for the construction of a pulpit in front of his church.

GLEANINGS HERE AND THERE.

The Church building fund aided in the building of sixty-six churches in 1928—one for each five days. Its list contains two hundred and fifteen church buildings being paid for from it.

Church of England missions in Madagascar are so successful that it is believed division of the dioceses will be necessary soon and the Church on the great island is nearly self-supporting.

Reports from Latin-America agree that in most of the countries of that region there is remarkable revival of interest in religion which has been dormant or lost many years. Protestant churches of several denominations and the Roman Catholics are having similar encouraging experience.

A society intended to contend for ordination and full ministry in all denominations for women has been organized at London. The membership includes a number of prominent Weslayans and clergy of the Church of England.

Of 894 students in the twelve Presbyterian theological seminaries of this country, but 551, or 61 per cent, are members of the Presbyterian Church, the others intending to serve other denominations.

The Seamen's Church Institute of New York City, now in its eighty-fifth year of usefulness, has doubled its building at 25 South Street. It has a staff of fifteen especially trained men and women. Among its activities last year were furnishing of over 323,000 lodgings for sailors and identification and restoration to families of 275 lost men.

Bishop Rowe gained so much time by his flight to Point Hope last year that he decided to go to St. John's-in-the-Wilderness, Allakaket, by plane this year. After visiting all the mission stations along the Yukon and Tanana Rivers this summer, he came to Fairbanks and arranged to fly to Allakaket. Bishop Rowe made the round trip to Allakaket in one day; where it would have taken weeks by the river route. He is enthusiastic about the possibilities of the airplane in this country of magnificent distances.

Archdeacon Russell Resigns as Principal of St. Paul's School, Lawrenceville, Virginia.

At a meeting of the Trustees of St. Paul's School, Lawrenceville, held in the Diocesan Office on December 13, the following resolution was adopted:

Whereas, At a meeting of the Board of Trustees of St. Paul Normal and Industrial School, held on May 28, 1928, the Rev. James S. Russell, D. D., founder of the school, after forty years of faithful and devoted service in which he succeeded in building up a work that will be forever a monument to his consecration and ability, tendered his resignation as principal; and

Whereas, The Board of Trustees tabled this request indefinitely in recognition and appreciation of his work, believing that in spite of his advancing years he could still render valuable service to the cause to which he has given his life; and

Whereas, The Board has received a second request from him that he be relieved of active management and responsibility for the conduct of the school with the request that the same be placed in the hands of those who for many years have assisted him in the work: namely, the Vice-Principal and Business Manager;

Be it, therefore, Resolved:

First: That with a sense of profound regret, with deep love, affection and admiration for him with a desire still to retain as far as possible Dr. Russell's valuable services, and yet realizing the responsibility on the part of the Board of Trustees to see to it that what he has built up through his own devotion, the generosity of friends and the goodness of God shall be a lasting monument to his achievement, we reluctantly comply with his request for relief from active management.

Second: (a) That Dr. Russell be given the official title of Principal Emeritus.

(a) That the salary be continued at $1,800 and house at present.

(c) That the Rev. J. Alvin Russell be and is hereby elected Principal."

The wonderful service rendered by Archdeacon Russell to his race through his ministry in this Church is known to all. Almost every mission among the colored people of the Diocese of Southern Virginia owes its origin to his consecrated efforts and his name is a household word throughout Southside Virginia. It is in St. Paul's School, however, that he has built the most enduring structure for the carrying on of the mission of our Church to colored people. There will appear in the Church papers a more detailed account of this work in the near future.

Dr. Russell will continue his residence at the school in Lawrenceville and will maintain his contacts with the host of friends he has made for the school over all the land. His presence and advice will be invaluable to his son and successor in the carrying on of the work.

Bishop Tucker Home.

Glad news has come from Norfolk, Virginia, to the effect that the beloved Bishop of Southern Virginia, the Rt. Rev. Beverley D. Tucker, D. D., has returned home from the hospital where he has been seriously ill for many weeks. Very slowly and gradually he is showing slight improvement.

National Council Meeting, December 11 and 12.

"I hope I may be able to persuade the people of the Church generally to speak of our National Council, not the National Council," said Bishop Anderson in an informal address which he made in opening the Council meeting on December 11, the first under his presidency. Speaking further of his newly assumed responsibilities and his study of the work of the departments, he emphasized the welcome sympathy and cooperation which had already been extended to him, and his purpose of furthering and interpreting the work of the Council and departments to the large constituency with which he hopes to establish contact as the days go on. "If I had been asked at any time of my life," he said, "what position I should have regarded as most remote from me and most inaccessible to me, I would have said, 'Presiding Bishop and President of the National Council'."

Proceeding immediately to matters of business, the Presiding Bishop reported that the vice-president, Dr. Lewis B. Franklin, whose office is filled by appointment of the Presiding Bishop, felt that this office had been vacated by the death of Bishop Murray. "It simply did not occur to me that the vice-president's office terminated," said Bishop Anderson, "but he thinks it did, and he is a man of strong opinions. In order to remove any doubts in his mind, I should like to make my first official act as the President of the National Council the reappointment of Dr. Franklin as vice-president of the Council, subject to your confirmation." The Council unanimously confirmed the appointment.

The Presiding Bishop then spoke of his previous appointment of Bishop Burleson as his assessor and expressed his desire to "make a rather liberal use of my assesor to assist me in those duties of the Presiding Bishop, which pertain to him as president of the Council." The Council's feeling in the matter was expressed in the following resolution, presented by Bishop Perry and unanimously carried:

"That the members of the National Council have heard with satisfaction and unreserved approval the announcement by the Presiding Bishop of his purpose to make his assessor, the Bishop of South Dakota, his assistant also in the administration of the affairs of the Council.

"The Council concurs in the Presiding Bishop's interpretation of the assessor's office and welcomes the services of Bishop Burleson as the president's representative and deputy in such duties as may be assigned to him in this capacity."

Great satisfaction that the President of the United States has authorized the signing of the Protocols looking toward the participation of this country in the World Court, and the earnest hope that the Senate will confirm this action, were expressed in a resolution presented by the Department of Social Service and adopted by the Council.

Yellow fever during the past year wrought havoc in the Church's work in Liberia, the death of Miss Maryland Nichols resulting from it in January, 1929, and in June that of Mr. James L. Sibley, whose work as educational adviser to the government was of incalculable benefit. Other foreigners and natives have succumbed to the disease. The Department of Missions reported that the Advisory Committee on Education in Liberia, formed by a number of interested organizations, which Mr. Sibley represented, has undertaken, in conference with the United States Department, to supplement funds provided by the Liberian government to send out a sanitary engineer to combat the disease. Amounts varying from $2,500 to $500 have been promised by colonization societies, the Phelps-Stokes Fund, the Methodist and Lutheran Foreign Mission Boards and Mr. Harvey Firestone. The Department of Missions, with Bishop Campbell's recommendation, has made an emergency appropriation of $500. In presenting the need to its constituent societies, the Advisory Committee emphasized its conviction that the control and elimination of yellow fever in Monrovia is a vital condition of any program for the education and religious development of Liberia.

The Japanese government, through its Department of Education, has promised St. Paul's University, Tokyo, an annual appropriation of $12,500 for ten years, beginning in January, 1930. The National Council learned with interest of this appropriation, as also of the fact that Dr. Y. Sugiura, vice-director of St. Paul's, has been requested by the government's Home Department to deliver a series of lectures on the Church of England, its history, organization and teachings, to Prince Takamatsu, younger brother of the Emperor. The Prince is to visit England in 1930, and desires to secure knowledge of the religious environment into which he will go.

Nineteen of the twenty-four Council members were present at the meeting. Bishop Lawrence, who for twenty years past has been a member, first of the Board of Missions, then of the National Council, had presented his resignation to Bishop Murray last August, but it had not been acted upon at the October meeting. It was presented at the December meeting and accepted with regret, the Council placing on record its high appreciation of Bishop Lawrence's faithful and notable service, his largeness of vision, soundness of judgment and wisdom in counsel.

Bishop Rogers, of Ohio, was elected to fill the place of Bishop Lawrence until General Convention of 1931. Dr. George Craig Stewart was appointed in his place in the Finance Department.

The only other change in the Council membership was the resignation of Mr. William J. Tully, who, as member elected by the Second Province, had presented his resignation to the President of the Provincial Synod. Bishop Stearly, reporting it to the Council, said that no appointment had yet been made to fill the office.

The episcopate continues to deplete the ranks of the Field Department, Dr. Schmuck, formerly a general secretary, becoming Bishop of Wyoming, and the Rt. Rev. Harwood Sturtevant, formerly an associate secretary, now Bishop Coadjutor of Fond du Lac. The Rev. Richard M. Trelease, General Secretary, has accepted the rectorship of St. Paul's Church, Kansas City, Missouri.

Giving their services free to the National Council, twenty-five clergymen and one layman throughout the country are now serving the Field Department as associate secretaries. The Rev. Messrs. Bland Mitchell of Birmingham, Ala., Floyd Rogers of Asheville, North Carolina, and Richard Trelease, are recent appointments to this group.

Other appointments made or confirmed, included the following: The Rev. Dr. Frank Gavin, member of the Commission on College Work. The Rev. Dennis Whittle, student pastor at Ohio Wesleyan University for a period of three years (contingent upon his acceptance of his election as rector of St. Peter's Church, Delaware, Ohio, where the University is situated.)

Miss Elsie Brown, worker among women students at the University of North Dakota for two years.

Miss Rachel Sumners, part-time worker among students in the Diocese of New York.

Mrs. Jennie Howard, worker among women students at the East Carolina Teachers' College for two years.

The Rev. Carter Harrison, student pastor at the South Dakota State College for two years.

The Rev. Hervey Cox, student pastor at Duke University for one year.

The Rev. Russell Hubbard, student pastor at the University of South Dakota for two years.

Mr. Coleman Jennings, associate secretary for college work.

The Rev. Gardiner M. Day, student pastor at Williams College for two years.

Reports of the special departments of the National Council will be carried in a later issue.

Rector's Services Appreciated.

"At a meeting of the Vestry of St. John's Church, Camden, Ark., on October 7, 1929, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

"Where, In the Providence of God, this parish has had the benefit of the faithful ministrations of the Reverend R. R. Claiborne for the period of five years, we desire to place upon record our great appreciation of his service in our behalf. We are assured that the parish at large unites with us in this sentiment and in this expression of our gratitude.

"As rector of the parish Mr. Claiborne has, at all times, proved himself a faithful shepherd of the souls committed to his care. His energy and optimism have been a never failing incentive to us to give of our best for the up-building of the Kingdom of God. By his sympathy and ever ready help to the sick and sorrowful; by his constant searching out and solicitous care for the poor and needy; by his love for our children as shown by his intensive interest and untiring work in the church school, he has endeared himself to the parish, and from that center has reached out into the unttermost bounds of the community, where his work in behalf of Christian unity, and all civic and educational movements, has made for himself a place amongst the leaders for the upbuilding of Camden.

"Therefore, Be it resolved, that we owe a debt of gratitude to him, and to his family, and that we hereby take this public recognition of the fact on the Fifth Anniversary of his coming to this parish; and further be it resolved that we renew our pledge of loyalty to him with the earnest wish that under his leadership we may have many more years of "Glad Service" in the Master's Cause.

"Signed—Vestry of St. John's Church."

NORTHERN INDIANA.

Rt. Rev. Campbell Gray, D. D., Bishop.

Many Join in Observance at Greek Orthodox Church, South Bend.

More than three hundred persons attended the annual celebration of St. Andrew's Greek Orthodox Church, South Bend, Indiana, held Sunday, December 1, in observance of St. Andrew's Day, the patronal festival of the Church.

At the Divine Liturgy Bishop Philaretos, Greek Orthodox Bishop of Chicago, preached the sermon, the officiant being the Rev. Philotheos Mazakopakis, resident Priest of St. Andrew's. Bishop Gray and the Russian Orthodox Priest of Mishawaka also joined in the service.

The banquet program, which followed was conducted in both Greek and English, and was marked by the presence of representatives of the Greek and Russian Orthodox, the Roman Catholic, several Protestant Churches, and the Episcopal Church, whose representatives were Bishop Gray, the Rev. Lawrence C. Ferguson, rector of St. James, South Bend, and the Rev. E. E. Smith, minister-in-charge of Trinity (Hungarian) Church, South Bend.

At the banquet Bishop Philaretos was the chief speaker, his address in Greek being interpreted in English by the toastmaster, Mr. Volos of Gary, Indiana, who is the district governor of the Ahepa Lodge.

Other speakers were Bishop Gray; Fr. Walsh, former president of Notre Dame University; Dr. Monger of the Methodist Church; Judge Cyrus E. Pattee, Judge of Circuit Court, and Fr. Philotheos. The keynote sounded by all, in addition to that of greater religious unity, was a comparison of the characteristics of St. Andrew and the manner in which they had been carried out by the local congregation.

WHILE ANGEL SONGS STILL ECHO.

F. B. Stone.

Awake! Awake! O give the Saviour greeting,
Upon His birthday open loving eyes,
And give Him now the best your love can render,
While angel songs still echo through the skies.

O praise and love Him with new understanding
Of what His love hath wrought for all mankind,
Through linking God the Father with His children,
Whom they with sin-filled hearts could never find.

But now through Jesus we can know the Father,
Because our Christ was born upon our earth
In likeness of our human flesh, uniting
The heavenly and the earthly in His birth.

O may our eyes be cleared to see this mystery
Unfolded in our Saviour's life while here;
How prayer kept Him united to the Father,
And brought our earth and heaven very near.

When He to His God and our God ascended,
Christ drew men's heart-strings to the world above,
That there might be no breach 'twixt earth and heaven
Through His ascension to the God of love.

And let us not, through hearts grown unbelieving,
Break any link in this great chain of love,
Remember that Christ's body bore the wound-prints
Our sins had made, to heaven's courts above.

Those wound-prints will continue still to witness
Against each one who fails here to repent,
The sins that made the scars upon our Saviour,
For all have shared in wounding Him God sent.

Thus could we give more fitting birthday greetings
Than our confessions of repented sin?
Or bring more welcome gifts upon His birthday
Than our own hearts for Him to enter in?

Why The Angels Sang.

H. H. Smith.

What was it that moved the heavenly host to sing on the Judean hills, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men?" The advent of the long-promised Messiah was at hand. The prophecies of the centuries were about to be fulfilled. The blessing was to come to "all nations", and those who had walked in darkness so long (the Gentiles, especially) were to see "a great light". The House of the Lord established on the mountains should see "all nations flow unto it." The redeemed would be numbered from every point of the compass, "from the East and West, and from the North and South." And the blessing the Saviour was to bring to the world was not only extensive—to all mankind—it was also intensive—He would "save unto the uttermost". It was to reach both body and soul. He would give them "new hearts," and "bind up the broken-hearted."

If the deliverance of the Jews from Babylon was enough to make the prophet declare that all nature was in such sympathy with the momentous event that even "the mountains and the hills would break forth into singing and all the trees of the field clap their hands for joy," we need not be surprised that angels should come to earth to announce the advent of the Messiah who would bring deliverance from sin to all mankind.

The prophets have not spoken in vain. "From North and South and East and West, they come; from every land beneath the sun, they come." Turn to the Far North and hear Beck, Edgerton Young, Grenfell, and others, tell how those of the frozen North have been transformed by the Gospel of Christ. Among the early missionaries to Greenland was John Beck, a Moravian missionary. The outlook for the success of the Gospel was anything, but promising, but, as Dr. A. J. Gordon says: "One seed of the Scripture from his (Beck's) lips—the story of the Saviour's agony in the garden—fell into the heart of a savage by the name of Kajarnak—into a heart all overgrown and choked with the thorns of barbarism—and immediately it germinated and brought forth fruit. The stolid savage became a disciple; the disciple became an evangelist. His dull heart kindled with an astonishing glow, while with flowing tears and resistless pathos he recited to his countrymen the story of the cross. This was the beginning of success in that field; and Kajarnak is counted among the miracles of grace in modern missions."

Now turn from the "icy fields of Greenland to the torrid plains of the Dark Continent," Africa, and hear how Afriqaner, who was "such an incarnate fiend that he actually made a virtue of cruelty and a diversion of murder, killing men in order to make drum heads of their skins and drinking cups of their skulls," was reached by the Gospel. Dr. Gordon says: "The audacity of his crimes created a reign of terror throughout the country where he dwelt, and neither savage chiefs nor colonial governments had found out any way to tame him. But Robert Moffat went to him in spite of the most earnest warnings to the contrary. He conquered him, not with carnal weapons, but with the Living Word. The germ-principle of that Word being implanted in his heart, a whole harvest of sweet and Christ-like virtues sprang up. The demon of cruelty became a meek disciple of Christ, and such a disciple that Moffat was able to say of him, concerning the whole time of his association with him after his conversion, 'I do not once remember having occasion to be grieved with him or to complain of any part of his conduct; his very faults seemed to lean to virtue's side.' His dying testimony was: 'I feel that I loved God, and that He has done much for me, of which I am totally unworthy. My former life is stained with blood; but the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin.' Do we wonder now that 'the angels sang'?"

Dr. Morrison, a missionary to the Congo, related this incident at a missionary convention some years ago: "Only a few days before I left Luebo an old woman about sixty years of age came to the station, and her right arm from her finger tips to her shoulder was a reeking mass of sores. The bones of the elbow and hand were protruding through the rotten flesh. I asked her what was the matter. She said they accused her of being a witch, and in order to test it compelled her to put her arm into a pot of boiling oil. The poor woman lived along a few weeks, and died in great agony." The Gospel of Christ has saved multitudes from such inhuman cruelties and superstitions.

Can a human being sink lower than cannibalism? Hear the testimony of James Calvert, the pioneer missionary to the Fiji Islands: "When I first arrived at the Fiji group my first duty was to bury the hands, feet, heads, and bones of arms and legs of eighty victims, whose bodies had been roasted and eaten in a cannibal feast. I lived to see the very cannibals who had taken part in that inhuman festival gathered about the Lord's Table." No wonder "the angels sang!"

The people of Tierra del Fuego were described by Darwin, in 1833, as follows: "The Fuegians are in a more miserable state of barbarism than I ever expected to have seen any human being. The expression of their faces is inconceivably wild, and their tones and gesticulations are far less intelligible than those of domestic animals." Some thirty or forty years later, after missionary efforts, Darwin said: "I certainly should have predicted that not all the missionaries in the world could have done what has been done." Darwin became a contributor to the South American Missionary Society, and in a letter to the secretary said: "It is wonderful, and it shames me, as I always predicted failure. It is a grand success. I shall feel proud if your committee think fit to elect me an honorary member of your society." No wonder "the angels sang!"

We have not yet a warless world, it is true, but hopeful progress toward that goal is being made. When it shall have been reached, as it surely will be, it will be seen that it was brought about by the practice of the principles of the Prince of Peace, of whom "the angels sang!"

The Nativity.

In the fulness of time God sent forth His Son." Forth from the Eternal World into this world. Keep both worlds in view all the time.

We have come now to that event in the history of our race for which all previous history was only a preparation, that stupendous event which bridged over the chasm between God and man, when He came down to earth in human guise "whose goings forth have been from of old, from everlasting."

And the first thing that strikes one—so utterly unlikely, so almost incredible at first sight—is the simple, ordinary way in which the great thing happened. If He had come with mighty cataclysm and rending of the heavens, that was to be looked for. But to come in this simple, ordinary way! And yet, on second thought, is not this God's method in working all His wonders? Is it not "just like Him," as we say? That is how they do things in that Eternal World. In the building of an oak, in the making of a planet, in the wonder of the dawn, in the miracle of the yellow harvest—that seems God's method always, quiet, simple, unnoticed.

So Jesus came in utter, unexpected simplicity, not with pomp or glory or rending of the heavens, but gently, quietly, as the dew comes or the dawn. Here is a stupendous happening, beyond the grasp of thought, and so easily does it blend with the simple elements of life around that we feel some difficulty in retaining any wonder and awe. One feels almost as if reading an ordinary village chronicle.

So easily, simply, naturally did the Christ become man.

One day—one night, perhaps, at her prayers—came suddenly on the maiden a stirring of her whole being and the awe of the Supernatural, and an angel vision and a voice from the Unseen,

> Hail, thou that art highly favored,
> The Lord is with thee.

And as she bowed there, trembling in astonishment and awe, in that hour came to her the tremendous announcement that the great hope of Israel, the hope of the long ages, was to be fulfilled at last.

"Fear not, Mary, thou hast found favour with God. And behold, thou shalt conceive and bring forth a Son, and thou shalt call His name Jesus. He shall be great and shall be called the Son of the Highest . . . and of His kingdom there shall be no end. The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee and the power of the Most High shall overshadow thee. Wherefore, also, that holy one to be born of thee shall be called the Son of God."

And Mary said, "Behold the handmaid of the Lord. Be it unto me according to Thy word."

And the angels departed from her. Silence alone becomes us here, and the veil drawn before a woman's heart. No note or comment must intrude on the sacred reticence of that story, which could only have come to us through Mary herself.

Did ever baby enter this world in lowlier guise? And do we not all love Him the more for it? Somehow it would spoil the picture if He had been born in a palace with princesses to wait on Him and high priests in attendance. That poor little Baby, whom nobody noticed, comes to us in His helplessness with such clinging appeal, as if trusting Himself utterly to us, as if bidding for our affection, wanting us to be fond of Him. So touchingly, appealingly did the Christ-child come.

But that is only half the story of His birthday. The angels are coming in. Two worlds are in the picture. Keep the whole picture in view, else the story will go wrong.

Simply, ordinarily as the coming of the dawn, happened this tremendous thing in the history of the universe, the coming of the Lord of Glory into human life. On the earthly side just a stable, a manger, the cattle in the stalls, a woman wrapping her baby in swaddling clothes. Nothing of wonder in it. Nothing of awe. Until the world from which He came flashes in upon the scene, where high over the stable, outside in the starlight, was the heavenly host, stirred to its depths at the coming of the Christ-child.

Remember it is all one story, all one picture—the Divine Babe on the earth, who had come from the heavens, and over Him in the heavens the angels outside rejoicing and keeping His birthday. Again I repeat, in the life of the Christ keep always in your consciousness the world from which He came. We believe in it all right. But we are dull and slow of heart. We let it slip out of view. And so our picture gets out of focus.

No part of the Christ story has so touched our imagination as this inrush from the other world; how its music swelled and died over the pasture-fields of Bethlehem with its glad tidings of great joy which should be to all people; how the hosts of Heaven, as they listened, could not restrain their delight, breaking forth in the eternal anthem of their world above—Glory to God in the Highest!

But unless we keep habitually in mind that other world, that eager, interested, enthusiastic world, its very wonder and beauty tend to separate it from us, to make the picture of the angels from Heaven rather misty and cloud-like beside that of the manger and the Baby on the earth. Now that must not be. Any haziness as to the reality and close presence of that world puts the whole story out of gear. For this is no mere exquisite poetic fancy, hallowed by sweet associations of childhood. It is just part of the story of the Baby and the swaddling clothes. Both must go together. Both are equally real. It takes both to complete the picture.

Jesus, to whom that World was His native air, always sees the two worlds together. He speaks of Heaven and angels and spirits as familiarly as we speak of our native town and the friends that we know. When He looks upon a little child on earth, He sees also its guardian angel before the Father's face in Heaven. When He sees a sinner repenting on earth, He sees the joy in the presence of the angels. He feels that that native world of His is always around Him, always interested in our world.

We have already noted that every incoming of God into human life, every spiritual uplift which this world receives, is begun in that World before we know anything about it here. It is known on that side long before its manifestation on this side. Think, then, how we should expect such a stupendous project as this Incarnation of the Eternal Son to have been acclaimed in Heaven at the beginning, and followed with adoring interest when the stage was shifted to earth and we shall see how fittingly comes in the angel joy that night over the glad tidings that should be to all people, "Unto you is born this day, in the city of David, a Saviour, who is Christ the Lord."—(A People's Life of Christ—J. Paterson Smyth).

THE BIRTHDAY OF THE LORD.

Gene Scott Wright.

Once more the changing months bring round the birthday of the Lord;
The angels still are singing of His peace to earth restored,
But man is still forgetful of the promise of His Word—
His Day is marching on.

We spend the hours in pleasure, gifts we each to other bring;
How few of us remember now gifts should be for the King.
How few within His temple kneel, how few His praises sing!
His Day is marching on.

The cards of greeting now we send without one word of Him
Who came two thousand years ago, announced by cherubim,
To shepherds for their present joy and for our future dim.
His Day still marches on.

Come, friends, let us remember now the birthday of the Lord,
And listen to the angels sing His peace on earth restored.
We may trust now and forever in the promise of His Word—
His Day is marching on.

For the Young People

CHILDREN'S SONG OF THE NATIVITY.

How far is it to Bethlehem?
Not very far.
Shall we find the stable-room
Lit by a star?

Can we see the little Child,
Is He within?
If we lift the wooden latch
May we go in?

May we stroke the creatures there,
Ox, ass or sheep?
May we peep like them and see
Jesus asleep?

If we touch His tiny hand
Will He awake?
Will He know we've come so far
Just for His sake?

Great kings have precious gifts,
And we have naught,
Little smiles and little tears
Are all we brought.

For all weary children
Mary must weep.
Here, on His bed of straw
Sleep, children, sleep.

God in His mother's arms,
Babes in the byre,
Sleep, as they sleep who find
Their heart's desire.

—Frances Chesterton.

"Our Lord Emmanuel."

Let me tell you a true story about two boys who were the best of pals, who were almost always together and who were devoted to each other.

One cold winter's day these two boys went to a nearby lake to play hockey. The water in this lake was deep and used to freeze solid in the middle of winter so that the ice was sometimes a foot and a half thick. On such a lake, in real cold weather, there would seem to be very little danger of going through the ice. But it happened that an ice company had been cutting ice there the day before. The water had frozen again where the men had been cutting, but the ice in this spot was not yet thick enough to bear human weight.

In the midst of the hockey game, excited by the play, the older of these two boys, chased after the ball over this thin ice, which suddenly gave way with him and left him struggling in the water. He could not swim. Just as he was sinking, perhaps for the last time, he looked up and saw a hockey stick reached toward him. He seized it and struggled up onto the firm ice. It was his young friend who, at the risk of his own life, had reached the stick out to him and had saved him. There were many boys on the ice that day who were older than his friend and even some grown men, but none of these had dared to come to the help of the boy struggling in the water for fear of falling in themselves. Only his friend had been willing to take that risk.

This story is a very simple account of a fine act of heroism. Do you suppose that the boy who saved his friend stopped to think whether it was better to be a hero or not, better to give life than to keep it, better to be unselfish than selfish? No. I do not believe that any such thoughts entered his head. Love prompted his act and gave him the courage to do it. Love is the key to all that is noble and heroic, and love is found in its perfection only in Jesus Christ.

"God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son, to the end that all that believe in him should not perish, but have everlasting life."

When we hear these great words let us remember how the love of God came into the world in Jesus Christ, our Redeemer. I have told you of the rescue of a boy from drowning in the water. The Gospels tell of the rescue of the world from drowning in the overwhelming flood of evil. Jesus, our Lord, reaches out to us to save us from evil, to draw us up to His side, where we may walk with Him in the way of service, of nobleness, of unselfish love. Is there any better life than such a life? And if it is best, do we not want to live that way ourselves?

The world needs Christian living more than it needs anything else. There is no lack of material wealth in the world. Certainly this is true of our own country. There is food enough for all, clothes enough, shelter enough. Of material wealth there is abundance, but of spiritual wealth there is not nearly enough. So poor are we spiritually that we have not the power and grace and wisdom necessary to a just distribution of our material wealth. This is why there is so much poverty, squalor, and misery in our rich land. Unselfish Christian stewardship is needed to improve this condition. Good will is needed, the good will of which the angels sang on Christmas morning. God is needed. We need our Lord Emmanuel.

However good and great and noble and heroic a man may become, he will always find Jesus Christ walking on ahead of him. Socrates, for example, was a good and noble man, who was willing to die for the sake of the truth and who did die for the truth's sake. But as we look carefully at the life of Socrates we see how immeasurably it fell short of the goodness, the nobility, the unselfish love of our Lord's life. The wise Greek philosopher gives in his death evidence of no little pride, great as he was. But in the Saviour there is no trace of pride; all is love. Never is there irony in Him, but always the most profound compassion.

One great fear I have for this land of ours, and it is a fear shared by many thoughtful people who understand something of history and of human nature. My fear is that we Americans may become so wrapped up in the pursuit of material wealth, so keen about money and luxuries and pleasures, that we shall grow proud, narrow, selfish, dead to all the fine things of mind and soul. If this happens, we will become unfit to live on God's good earth, and will perish.

Over against this fear stands a great hope. This hope is that we may come to look more and more to Christ as our leader and Redeemer. There are many signs that this hope may be fulfilled. Its fulfillment will be our salvation. Can this hope be realized? The answer lies with the children of America.—Rev. John H. Yates.

Carolyn and the Christmas Carol.

The lingering shadows of a dull gray December day fell softly over the world as Carolyn Webber, arm in arm with her best friend, Martha Brown, made her way down the long, narrow street leading from the main thoroughfare of Centertown to the more select residential district.

"I think it's wonderfully sweet of you, Carolyn," said Martha, "to give your assistance in the Christmas carol singing; you have such a marvelous voice."

"You flatterer," laughed Carolyn. "My voice is no better than yours—but I shall be very glad, indeed, to sing before the lighted windows on Peachtree Street on Christmas Eve night."

Martha looked at her companion in surprise at that statement, for no one knew better than she herself that the girls who composed the Master's Daughters' Club, and who were sponsoring the carol singers for Centertown on Christmas Eve, had eliminated Peachtree Street altogether, but now the idea came to her, had she better tell Carolyn. Carolyn was a resident of Peachtree Street, and from the conversation just uttered, Martha learned that she expected to sing only on that particular street.

For a few minutes the girls walked in silence, then suddenly Martha turned to her friend.

"I'm afraid, Carolyn," she said softly, "you misunderstand the true meaning of the carol singers."

"I think not," responded Carolyn. "Miss King said we were to go in groups of four and everywhere we found a lighted candle in the window we were to stop and sing."

"Yes," admitted Martin, "but did she mention Peachtree Street?"

Carolyn meditated a second, then smiled broadly. "I don't believe she did mention this particular street, but I took it for granted she wouldn't ask me to sing anywhere else."

"And may I ask why?" interrupted Martha.

"Well," answered Carolyn leisurely, "I scarcely believe Miss King would ask the daughter of Centertown's wealthiest citizen to sing anywhere except before the homes of the exclusive set of this town."

"Miss King is president of the Master's Daughters' Club, Carolyn," Martha reminded her, "and therefore would give no consideration as to class or rank so long as she was doing service for the glory of God."

"All the same," responded Carolyn, "she wouldn't ask me to use my voice before an unappreciative audience."

"I'm sure of that," answered Martha, "but take it from me, my dear, sometimes we find the most appreciative audiences where we least expect them, and so far as I am concerned, I shall gladly go anywhere they may send me."

"Your religion is stronger than mine, Martha dear," chuckled Carolyn. "I shall sing only on Peachtree Street."

Another five minutes' walking brought the girls to Martha's gate and after a few hasty words, they separated, Carolyn moving towards a more pretentious mansion.

"Poor girl," murmured Martha as she stood on her own door step watching her friend disappear around the corner. "She's wonderfully sweet, but her vision is too narrow—won't sing anywhere except on Peachtree Street—eh? Well, if she won't, she just won't, and that's all!" With that Martha stepped into the hall and closed the door.

But Carolyn's statement lingered in her mind and at the called meeting the next morning, she spoke to the president of the matter.

"I will have to see Carolyn," said Miss King. "She surely couldn't mean that she wouldn't sing the Christmas carols where we want her to."

"But I won't sing elsewhere," declared Carolyn, when Miss King approached her on the subject. "I don't care for hovels and poverty, and I won't spend my strength singing to unappreciative audiences!"

"Very well," said Miss King, in a grieved tone of voice, "I would not insist on your giving your voice in the name of the Master to others than you care to sing to: but, my dear girl, I had hoped through your beautiful voice to carry a message of peace and good will to the tenement dwellers on the south side."

Carolyn lifted her head proudly, then turned and walked away.

"The very idea," murmured the girl when she reached her own room again, "asking me to go to the south side to sing Christmas carols to the tenement dwellers! I won't do it—that's all!" And a few minutes later Carolyn was cuddling down in a big arm chair before the fire, with a new book, but somehow, for the life of her she couldn't get interested in the story.

In spite of herself she couldn't get rid of the thought that she had refused to carry the Christmas message to the lonely, but Carolyn was stubborn, and once having decided on a thing she had never been known to change her mind.

But as the days went by and no word came from the president of the club, Carolyn's heart sank within her. For the first time in her life she really knew what it was to be exclusive, for in the ten days since her open statement that she would not sing except where she chose to sing, the girls of the club had left her altogether alone. Being exclusive, after all, wasn't very much to be proud of; how she wished she had stuck to the crowd and done her part. But not until Christmas-eve morning dawned did she give up hope that she would be called to help. Slowly the hours of nine, ten and eleven o'clock went by and still no call came. Then it was Carolyn could stand the strain no longer, and donning her bright cloak she slipped out of the house and hastened to the church.

Just as she expected, she found the church class room humming with excited voices; baskets of food and bags of candy, fruits and toys filled a long table in one corner, while from an adjoining room came the sound of many voices practicing the Christmas carol they were to sing that night.

Carolyn's heart was aching to enter the room beyond when the door swung open and Martha Brown stood before her.

"Well, well!" exclaimed Martha, "of all the people in the world, if here isn't the one we need most!"

"Oh!" cried Carolyn, softly, "can I really help at this late hour?"

"Help?" repeated Martha. "I should say you can. Flo Martin is ill this morning and won't be able to sing tonight, and you can take her place." Suddenly Martha remembered Carolyn's refusal to sing anywhere except on Peachtree Street. "Flo was to sing on Fifth Avenue, Carolyn," said Martha softly. "Will you sing there? It's next to Peachtree Street."

"No," said Carolyn, softly, "I won't—I am going to sing on the south side—somebody else can sing on Fifth Avenue. You see, Martha, I've learned in the past few days that being exclusive isn't what it's cracked up to be; after this I am just going to be normal and happy and leave exclusiveness to those who haven't any broader vision."

"You sweet thing!" cried Martha, as her arms went around her friend's slender waist, "I knew you'd find yourself in time to sing the Christmas carols."

So it happened that the tenement dwellers of south side Centertown received along with their Christmas baskets from the hands of charity, the most wonderful music they had ever heard, and Carolyn Webber in singing the Christmas carols to such an audience discovered the secret of spreading over the world the peace and good will the angels sang about when they brought the first Christmas carols to the earth.—Presbyterian Advance.

IF I HAD BEEN.

"If I had been a shepherd boy,
Out on the hills that Christmas night,
And heard the angels' song of joy
And seen the heavens flaming white,
I think I never could forget;
I know I'd be remembering yet!
I could not be a shepherd boy,
For that was long and long ago;
But still the angels' chant of joy
Comes echoing across the snow,
And I can listen if I will
And hear their holy anthems still.

"If I had been a sleeping guest.
Lodged at the inn that Christmas night
When the new Lord was laid to rest
In the cold stall in humble plight.
I know I would have waked instead
And given Him my warm, soft bed.
But I was not a lodger there,
It was so long ago indeed,
Yet all around me everywhere
Are little children still in need.
And when I love and cherish them
I serve the Babe of Bethlehem."

"If I had been a wise man's son,
And seen the star that Christmas night,
And watched the travelers starting on
Their journey toward the wondrous light,
I would have begged to go with them
To worship Christ at Bethlehem.
I could not follow with the star—
That was two thousand years gone by—
But still its shining is not far,
Its holy beams are very nigh
And whoso looks with praying eyes
Still sees its glory in the skies."

The Children's Tree.

There would be presents, of course, Christmas morning, but no tree. Dick was lying in bed with a broken leg. His room was too small for a tree, mother explained, and Dick could not be moved. Gaylord and Ruby saw Dick blink back some disappointed tears. They stole out of the room, they were so sorry for him.

"I wish we could have a little tree for "Let us have one outdoors," exclaimed Gaylord. He was looking out at a tree, the low branches of which drooped near Dick's window.

"A bright idea," cried Beth.

"What can we trim it with?" asked Gaylord eagerly.

Beth led the way to the attic. Here she removed the long, gilt chains from some hanging baskets. "Take the small wire baskets, too," she directed.

"Oh, let us get the Christmas tree trimmings from last year!" begged Ruby.

Beth found them and handed out the bright, jingly balls, the shining star, and a number of other things.

Gaylord found some little bells last Christmas, and he put these with the other ornaments. "Now for the reddest apples that we can find," he cried. And away the children danced.

When the apples were ready, Beth brought out some bright ribbons and cord, and agreed to make pop-corn balls while the children trimmed the tree.

What a busy, merry afternoon they had, trying tme gay trinkets to the icy limbs, together with apples, oranges, and, after a time, pop-corn balls. Now and then they lowered their voices and glanced at Dick's window to make sure that the curtains were still down. At last dusk came. The longest day in the year to most children, had seemed a short day to these little folks.

The next morning the children were up early, making merry over their presents in Dick's room. "Won't he be surprised?" Gaylord and Ruby whispered to each other. But, when the curtains were drawn, Dick was hardly more surprised than they were. Mother Nature had been busy with trimmings, in the shape of a little powder of snow, and had lighted the whole trees with bright, morning sunshine. It glittered with thousands of diamond lights. This was not all. Birds were hopping about the branches and pecking gayly at the suet that Beth had fastened in the wire baskets. Through the open window came the sound of their chirping.

"It's splendid!" cried Dick. "And such a lively tree!"

"We trimmed it ourselves," exclaimed Ruby.

With Beth's help," said Gaylord.

"And with Mother Nature's help, too," added Ruby.—Exchange.

The Little Wax Candle.

On a shelf in a big store lay many, many little wax candles. They were all busily talking one day about what they should like to do some time, when bustle, rustle! and they were picked up in a great bunch and wrapped in a paper.

That very night every little wax candle was blazing brightly on a beautiful tall tree. Puff! came a draft of air, and blew out one little candle.

"Dear me," thought the little candle, when no one came to light it again, "that will be the end of my fun." All the other little candles shone and shone until they were burned away.

Then after Christmas was over and the tree was put out in the back yard, ragged Jimmy found the good little candle still clinging to the old tree. How happy he was! He took it home to his little brothers and sisters, and that very night they got a branch from an evergreen tree. Jim fastened it in an old box, put the little candle on the topmost twig and lighted it. Then such a merry, merry time as they had playing.

"It's more fun to play Christmas tree than anything I know of," thought the little wax candle; and I am sure the children thought so, too.—Selected.

All God's biddings are enablings.—Burridge.

O Lord, we wonder at such love
  Bestowed on such as we;
But since Thou gav'st Thyself for us,
  We give ourselves to Thee!

And thus we celebrate the day
  When Christ in grace came down,
And wait till He in glory comes
  His work of Grace to crown.

IN MEMORIAM.

Nannis Selden Cooke.

In loving memory of NANNIS SELDEN COOKE, beloved daughter of the late Henry Pendleton Cooke and Elizabeth Kennedy Cooke, who died in Norfolk, Virginia, November 27, 1929.

Our richest gems are often found in modest setting and this choice soul gladdened her home by sweet acceptance of what seemed to her God's will in an exalted life of suffering.

Perhaps this life was made a pattern for others that we should rise to a higher view of God's purpose and that she was leading her loving followers. We now see that her quiet life was perfected through love.

Our tenderest joy is found in sweet repose and not in worldly acclamation—for as love begets love there is around each memory of her life a mantle of God's richest gift, Love. M. P. D.

"Will Ye Also Go Away?"

Words uttered in an appealing voice, by a man who held out appealing arms, to a congregation, made up of unshaven men in overalls; tired women, each with a babe in her arms, or with little ones at her side; and of young men and girls. People, some of whom had walked miles, not only one night but six, to hear the Word of God. Can you, dear readers, visualize yourselves walking two or three miles over rough country roads, to hear a man preach?

And the appeal, "Will ye also go away?" went straight to the hearts of every one in that church, resulting in most of them going up to the chancel steps to grasp the hand of the preacher, some promising to lead better lives, others accepting Christ for the first time. No emotion of any kind. Just a sincere desire to know Christ better. Never before in the history of that little church has such a mission been held.

The Missioner was Captain B. Frank Mountford, head of the Church Army in America. One who addresses fashionable congregations on Immortality, or on Mysticism, or on the deeper things of the Bible, but a man also, who can come to a mountain mission, and in a lovable, clear and simple way give to the people a message of Divine Love and Salvation. To know the man is to love him, to hear him preach, is to love Christ as never before. He filled the hearts of these mountain folk and all others who attended the services, with "good things" and they went away satisfied.

As a result of the mission conducted in Lynwood, Va., by Captain Mountford, this community will be a better, and happier place within which to live. Words cannot express our gratitude to God, for sending to us such a messenger. J. L.

Distressing Accident at Lynchburg.

In the afternoon of Friday, December 13, Mrs. Angus Crawford and Mrs. Hugh Worthington lost their lives, and Morton Wright was seriously injured in an automobile accident on the Episcopal School Road just out of Lynchburg.

Mrs. Crawford was the widow of the late Dr. Angus Crawford, for many years Professor and Dean of Virginia Seminary, and recently has been making her home with her son-in-law and daughter, the Rev. Dr. Oscar deWolf Randolph and Mrs. Randolph, at the Virginia Episcopal School, of which Dr. Randolph is rector.

Mrs. Worthington was the wife of Prof. Hugh Worthington, of the faculty of Sweet Briar College, about twelve miles north of Lynchburg.

Morton Wright, seventeen, a student at the school, is a son of the Rev. Dr. Cady Wright, rector of Christ Church, Savannah, Ga.

The three left the school at about 3:20 P. M., for Lynchburg, Mrs. Crawford driving the car. Just at the edge of the campus the road crosses a rather high steel bridge over a ravine. It appears that the wheel slipped off the driving rails along the floor of the bridge and that, in steering back onto the rails, Mrs. Crawford was unable to straighten out the wheels quite quickly enough. The machine went across the bridge, crashed through the fencing on the opposite side, hung for a second with the chassis on the edge of the bridge and then plunged over.

Mrs. Worthington was killed instantly. Mrs. Crawford died two hours and a half later at the Virginia Baptist Hospital. The Wright boy suffered a fracture of the thigh and perhaps internal injuries. As this is written, however, it is thought he may recover. T. A. S.

This is the largest and most representative class ever confirmed in Everett. The rector, the Rev. The Junior Choir of thirty girls sang for the first time, with the Senior Choir of fifty voices, at this service.

Mrs. William B. Beach, sixty-two, wife of the Rev. Dr. William B. Beach, rector of Church of Our Saviour, Jenkintown, died December 13, after being ill two days. Funeral services were held on Monday at the church.

Mrs. Beach is survived by her husband, and two sons, William J. and Harold Beach.

The first services of the new St. Michael's congregation, which has been transferred to Yeadow from its now abandoned site at Nineteenth and Lombard Streets, Philadelphia, were held on Sunday, December 15, with the Rev. Frank Williamson, Jr., in charge.

This new enterprise will be carried on as a parochial mission of St. Mark's Church, Philadelphia. A lot has already been purchased at Longacre Park to form the site of the contemplated church to be made possible by the sale of the old property on Lombard Street. Once this has been accomplished, Mr. Williamson believes the congregation will soon after become an independent parish.

The old congregation from the Lombard Street area will in the future worship with St. Mark's regular congregation on Locust Street.

French Services.

French Services at 4 P. M. every Sunday have been resumed at St. John's Church, Sixteenth Street, with M. le Pasteur Florian Vurpillot in charge. These services are arranged especially for the many people in Washington, whose language is French, and who otherwise would have no real church home. The music is rendered in French also, by a group of volunteer singers of Washington.

St. Alban's School.

The new lower school building of St. Alban's School for Boys was thrown open to inspection Friday afternoon, December 13, and more than 300 guests were received by the Bishop of Washington, and Mrs. Freeman. Others in the receiving line were the Very Rev. and Mrs. G. C. F. Bratenahl and the Rev. and Mrs. Albert Lucas.

St. Alban's is just completing the first quarter century, having been established in 1907 through a bequest of Mrs. Harriet Lane Johnston, a niece of President Buchanan, who gave the first building in memory of her two sons. From an initial enrollment of approximately fifty students, St. Alban's has grown to a present student body of more than 170.

The training of boys at different places in accordance with their individual ability is a distinct phase of St. Alban's program. The headmaster, the Rev. Mr. Lucas, came to Washington this fall from the Episcopal Academy at Overbrook, Pennsylvania.

The Annual Christmas Play at the National Cathedral School for Girls is looked forward to every year by the friends and patrons of the school, because of its high order and because of its very beautiful spiritual significance, and this year's presentation which occurred Saturday evening, December 14, in Whitby Hall, measured up to its usual high standard.

The general theme of the play was "A Medieval Christmas (as it might have been 600 years ago), and included the play of the Wise and Foolish Virgins (a morality play translated from a thirteenth century manuscript); The Farce of Esopet and the Tailor (probably one of the sources of Moliere's comedies), and The Queen's Gift (a miracle play by Madeline Hicks, based on a legend of France in the fourteenth century).

The whole was presented by the Players' Club, under the direction of Madeline Hicks, dramatic director of the school.

College of Preachers.

A weekly conference just ended at the Washington Cathedral College of Preachers included clergymen from the Maryland parishes of the Diocese of Washington and was devoted to the discussion of preaching and parochial problems.

THIS IS GOOD AND ACCEPTABLE IN THE SIGHT OF GOD OUR SAVIOUR. 1 TIM. 2:3.

After all, we may never be given any more of the good and glorious will of God to do than the thing that lies nearest to us now.

"Ah, think not if thou art not called
To work in mission fields
Of some far distant clime,
That thine is no great mission
Every deed that comes to thee
In God's appointed time
Is just the greatest deed that thine can be,
Since God's high will appointed it to thee."

My dear Mr. Williams:

You have given me another delightful surprise and pleasure in sending to me a further check for $512.00 covering contributions you received for our Missionary Deficit.

By your most interested work you have cleared the weights that clouded our conditions in Alaska and I now feel that we have come out of the clouds, are renewed and encouraged and hope to go on with increased fidelity and service.

Thanking you most heartily.

Sincerely yours,

PUSH ON

The righteous shall hold on his way, and he that hath clean hands shall be stronger and stronger (Job 17:9).

This one thing I do, forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus (Phil. 3:13-14).

Be ye steadfast, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord (1 Cor. 15:58).

The God of all grace, who hath called us unto his eternal glory by Christ Jesus, after that ye have suffered a while, make you perfect, establish, strengthen, settle you (1 Pet. 5:10).

Wherefore the rather, brethren, give diligence to make your calling and election sure: for if ye do these things, ye shall never fall (2 Pet. 1:10).—Compiled by Keith L. Brooks.

I lay my head at night upon the bosom of Omnipotence.—Samuel Rutherford.

Obedience, at the right time, to the divine guidance, brings an astonishing reward in the accomplishment of things that are impossible with men.

I am only one; but I am one. I cannot do everything, but I can do something; What I can do, I ought to do, and by God's grace I will do.

Here you stand at the parting of the ways. Some road you are to take, and as you stand here, consider and know how it is that you intend to live. Carry no bad habits, no corrupting associations, no enmities and strifes into this new year! Leave these behind, and let the dead past bury its dead! Leave them behind, and thank God that you are able to leave them!—E. Peabody.

He is dead who sees nothing to change,
No wrong to make right;
Who travels no new way or strange
In search of the light.
Who ever sets out for a goal
That he sees from afar,
But contents his indifferent soul
With things as they are

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

O Lord of the manifold mercies,
As we number them one by one,
From the least of Thy loving kindness
To the uttermost gift of Thy Son,
Lead us on from our selfish gladness
To the marvelous things Thou hast done.
—Annie J. Flint.

"When He sends them forth, they are not separated from Him, for He goes with them in the Spirit which He gives to each one, and is the hidden Presence of God in them all."

In taking revenge, a man is but even with his enemy; but in passing it by, he is superior; for it is a prince's part to pardon.—Bacon.

Each Sin has its door of entrance.
Keep that door closed!
Bolt it tight!
Just outside the wild beast crouches
In the night.
Pin the bolt with a prayer,
God will fix it there.
—John Oxenham.

The power to save for personal interests is indisputable proof that we can systematically lay aside for God's special enterprise.—The Church's Work.

We pause beside this door:
Thy year, O God, how shall we enter in?
The footsteps of a Child
Sound close beside us. Listen, He will speak!
His birthday bells have hardly rung a week,
Yet He has trod the world's press undefiled.
"Enter through me," he saith, "nor wander more.
For lo! I am the Door."
—Lucy Larcom.

We learned more from our follies than from the wisdom of others.

"God is the only source of that life which cannot fail, and His gift of faith is the means of forming a contact with His life-giving Spirit."

EXPLORATIONS

Lindberg, flying over the dense, deep, forests of Yucatan, noted and reported massive ruins of cities once populous, rich and powerful. Temples and palaces there are sunk to decay and fragments. The streets long ago scenes of busy traffic and trod constantly by hurrying feet are overgrown thickly with tall trees and strong vines. Where the clamor of multitudes of men and women, all intent on their varied affairs, was ceaseless the silence and stillness are broken by nothing but the stealthy tread of creatures seeking prey or escaping pursuit. So in Yucatan. Thousands of miles away, beyond wide seas, on other continents, other deserted and lost cities, relics of vanished kingdoms and empires and nations, are hidden by drifting sands of far-reaching desert, inhabited by jackal, fox, owl. On this continent, on all continents, the archaeologists and explorers are exhuming and discovering tokens and traces of gone and forgotten civilizations, grandeur, wealth, beauty.

Weird, fearful, solemn fascination, mystic speculation and wonderment, suggestion for wide and deep and varied thought, attend results of the delving into the long-hidden past. Babylon, Nineveh, Tyre, the dead cities of the Mayas, others in jungles of Africa and Honduras, abandoned homes of peoples of whose names and histories there are no written records, were flourishing, populous, rich, powerful a thousand, three thousand, five thousand, years ago. These cities, as Isaiah predicted of Babylon, are not dwelt in from generation to generation, but wild beasts lie there and cry in the desolate houses. In lands separated by vast distances, peoples who knew nothing of each other, of different races and languages, rose and grew, prospered, flourished. In dark, impenetrable wilderness, beneath dazzling sunlight on open plain, inland and by sea coast or river side, the cities of opulence, enterprise and large activities shrank, decayed, or suffered sudden destruction and were depopulated. Passage of time and processes of nature buried them from sight and memory. The familiar fancy of the New Zealander of the distant future moralizing over dismantled remnants of London is based on actually crumbling walls and voiceless desolations left by the remote past.

Stories of the dead and vanished nations and cities, so far as the relics reveal, are alike. All warn us of now of the perils of riches and imagined safety and ease, internal discords and strife, surrender to allurements of luxury, inviting invasion and decadence. They bring yet deeper significance. While all these diverse peoples were alternately rising to greatness and sinking to oblivion, one nation, weaker in numbers than Egypt or Babylon or Assyria or the Mayas, has survived defeats and disasters innumerable, captivity, exile, enforced distribution through all lands. In Israel always, after sore chastisement and humiliation, penitent prayer has ascended to the one God and rebellious and corrupted hearts have returned to loyalty to Him.

Of the ancient civilizations none but that of the Jews has survived unimpaired and ripening. They alone have maintained their individuality as a nation, their uniform spiritual organization, their common worship and faith, the language of their fathers. Survivals of old civilizations and creations of those new and far-excelling all formerly existing have come with allegiance to the Jehovah of Israel and to the Deliverer promised and sent for Israel. Baal of Babylon, the deities of Olympus and Egypt and the warriors and heroes of Teutonic and Norse mythology, have left the same stories. The scattering of mankind over the earth is enveloped in mystery, into which the Old Testament gives but the vaguest glimpses. Wherever man went he carried with him the instinct of worship, the yearning of his soul for something to which to pray, in which to trust, for belief in some being and some life higher and better than we may know here. Therefore, deities and gods were imagined. To all of these noble and majestic qualities were attributed. All were degraded gradually as human minds were diverted from the aspiration that is an element of uncorrupted nature and from the fears and needs of primitive life, urging the seeking of supernatural aid. Men, becoming intent on commerce and conquest, luxury and greed, lowered their gods. The powers on Olympus, at first intent on justice, vindicating virtue and punishing wrong, were brought down in Roman and Grecian lore to bestiality until in character and conduct they were no better than the cows and crocodiles before which the Egyptians abased themselves. Thor and Woden and the other heroes and warriors of the Valhalla of our own ancestors became mere buffoons, murderers and pirates, to be pleased by the drinking to them of the blood of slain foes from polished skulls. Traces of the Mayas show that their chosen objects of adoration, once represented as beautiful and stately, were reduced to hideous things, demanding human sacrifice by butchery. Through the thousands of years and the thronging changes, Jehovah has remained, Creator of all, Omnipotent, Omniscient, merciful, pure, infinitely beyond earthly motive, responsive to humility and penitence, to earnest effort in His service for the good of man and devout faith.

The clear, recorded, facts confound and contradict those who would blight and dwarf, harden and brutalize, the human soul, deny it kinship with Divinity, with the "higher criticism" that is the lowest conception. Governor Vance, of North Carolina, in his long famous and justly admired lecture on "The Scattered Nation", compared the Jews to the gulf stream, flowing ever through the ocean, part of it, yet always distinct and separate, going slowly, surely, irresistibly to its destined end and mission. He might have carried the fine thought further and higher. Through ages the people of the British isles were blessed with warmth and genial climate, making their soil productive and giving them life and strength, given them by this unseen and to them unknown current from a source mysterious, beyond their knowledge or imagination. Through the ages the merciful purposes of the Almighty have continued to move onward amid the clashing and tumults and risings and fallings of human affairs and passions and vicissitudes. Peoples who have devised their own objects of worship and faith have decayed, disappeared, sunk back to barbarism. The nations accepting Jehovah as their God and His Son as Lord and Saviour have survived and grown magnificently to power, used for betterment of the race. Barbarian tribes learning to believe in God and Christ have risen to dominance and leadership while others lingered in the stagnation presaging gradual retrogression; and the Jews remain intact, their destiny unfinished.

It must be difficult for the most besotted prejudice, vanity, superstition, credulity, to believe these facts mere accidents, happenings of random chance, as the higher critics and self-advertised profound thinkers tell us the universe itself is. We ordinary people who judge from what we see and know and feel, by the rules of evidence and the laws of probabilities and the ordinary sense by which life is ordered, must realize infinite Wisdom and unchanging purpose. To us the history we read and all the discoveries of exploration have but one meaning. That is the decrees of the Almighty Creator to whom a thousand years are as yesterday go always toward consummation, surely, steadily, irresistibly, as the flowing of the gulf stream; that the illimitable compassion of the Knower of all hearts extends to ignorance and weakness; that, sooner or later, in His good time and by His own ways, His gracious, beautiful, promise for our whole race will be accomplished, abundantly and gloriously.

A CRYING NEED IN THE COLLEGES

By a Church Worker on a College Campus

IT falls, probably, within the experience of most of us to awaken some time to the fact that things we have all our lives taken for granted have not the foundation we supposed and we are shocked to find, possibly, that we have almost been living in a fool's paradise.

Such an experience is apt to come to one who for the first half of her life has lived closely within a church circle, and is suddenly thrust out into the secular world where the Church is, at best, only incidental to the lives of a large proportion of people.

Within the charmed circle one is very apt to feel that the Church is so strong, so beautiful, so perfect that those who do not love her are almost the exception and must, sooner or later, come to understand and yield to her appeal. Without, one soon learns that to many the Church makes no appeal whatever.

The writer of this article has had just this rude awakening and speaks from such an experience. It is to be expected that such a changed point of view would bring some surprises, but probably not the ones which would be anticipated. One would expect to find, for instance, antagonism to, criticism of, the Church. That is rarely the case. What one actually does meet is profound indifference. To a large majority of persons the Church apparently is non-existent, and one seldom hears the persons one meets in the ordinary walks of life refer to it with any personal interest, favorable or otherwise.

The attitude of the world at large is probably too familiar to those who will read this article to need more than a passing reference.

The object of this article is to call attention especially to the conditions in our college towns, more particularly those where our women's colleges are situated. It is quite possible that with our adult population, who have a background of religious training and observance from which they have turned away, we can do comparatively little. But what about the young women crowding our colleges who come, many of them, from the homes of the above-mentioned indifferent adults and who hear in their college courses atheism, and agnosticism taught by clever professors? With no religious background, and generally no compulsive courses in religion to counterbalance such teaching, is it to be wondered at that the four years of college life leave these girls even less religious than it found them?

One fact is evident to the most casual observer. The colleges themselves, as well as the individual girls, are being swayed by this sentiment of the age, till public services in the college chapels are being made voluntary and few attend them, or they are being discontinued altogether. Girls from religious homes say they find themselves unable to stand against public opinion and even the heads of campus houses, who might be expected to set a different example, follow the fashion. Some of these women start enthusiastically with some religious observance in their respective houses but, as such things must be voluntary, one after one gives up her efforts because of all lack of interest and support.

From one girl after another, any inquirer may learn by questioning the more serious ones, that girls simply do not want to hear about religion. They consider the subject boring. And what is pitifully evident, even among the most earnest, is that, in their busy lives, there is not time for everything, and that religious observance of every kind is, of course, the thing to be cut out first. Sundays are spent in sleeping, studying, playing Bridge, and smoking and going to movies.

Unquestionably the most pathetic reason given by girls as to why they never go to church is this—"All week long we hear brilliant professors, who speak and lecture as experts on their several subjects. Why should we go on Sunday to hear stupid sermons by men who can't preach? It doesn't do any good. It is simply boring." And as any student of the situation goes about to judge for himself, he is obliged to recognize the truth of the criticism.

Young people are as truly hungry for religion as ever they were, and will go where they think they will be spiritually fed. In one college town where Sunday services have been largely abandoned, because the authorities will not ask preachers to come and speak to empty seats, the college chapel is packed if it is known that a good preacher is to come.

We may say that people should not go to church, because of the sermon, but the fact is that they do. The day has gone by when young people, at least, will go when they expect to be bored for any reason whatever.

What, then, is the solution of the problem? I can see but one. Arouse the finest and best young men of our land to feel the call to go into the work of the ministry, or give themselves as lay-workers, as Mr. Coleman Jennings has done, realizing that there can be no such glorious career as that of going to places where the young people of our country congregate in schools and colleges, to preach to them the Gospel of Jesus Christ and to make them see and believe that in Him only can be found the solution of the world problems of which their secular education is making them profoundly conscious.

Of course, two other problems immediately come to mind: Will these young men be willing to give their lives to the small parishes in which so many of our schools and colleges are situated, and how can the church see to it that they are placed there? Men such as are needed to do this tremendous piece of work are called to the large and rich and prosprous parishes in the land. How vestries can be handled and how the right men can be placed in the right parishes is beyond my power to say, but that problem must be solved, and will be when the church fully awakens to this most crying need.

And surely more men will be found—thank God we already have some—who will see a greater chance for service in the small town where a college is situated than in the greatest of our city parishes, and will be willing to stay there and serve the on-coming generations.

So many of our clergy are still content to go on with a more or less perfunctory fulfillment of parish duties and one is reminded of Dr. Sheppard's words in his "Impatience of a Parson". "I want a disturbance. I want almost anything rather than a continuance of the smothered institutional versions of the fire that Jesus Christ came to cast upon the earth . . . The question today is whether Christianity is to live as a dynamic force for the salvation of the world, or merely to exist as a moderating influence."

Our churches in almost all of the places which are our strategic posts because of the youth congregated there are not "dynamic forces", and the young people know it.

When they are it will be because the churches are led by men of force, of ability and consecration who have heard the call, "Whom shall I send, and who will go for us" into these college towns to win the young people to Christ, and have replied, at whatever sacrifice of salary and position, "Here am I; send me."

THE SURRENDERED LIFE---IN CHRIST

Conducted by Rev. Frank Cox

249 West Forty-third Street, New York City.

THE articles appearing under this heading have been absent for awhile and the reason can be told. The contributing editor had come to feel that they were not coming with a real enough ring, and so had ceased to send them until the matter could be straightened out. He found that the fault was within, he was not experiencing deeply enough the surrender he had been talking about.

A series of events last spring had brought this conviction. An attempted drive for money had left him spiritually cold, and as motives were traced down to their source it was impossible to find one that did not have its root in self rather than God. The unsurrendered state was chiefly manifested in the fear and self-consciousness that had for years been present. These fears were increased and fastened in place by the pride that feared influence would be lost if this defeated condition became known.

The past defeats and the division of character that had caused this fear were caused, the writer now believes, by a lack of courage at the very beginning of his definite Christian experience. He had found the power of the Living Christ while doing Brotherhood work about fifteen years ago in one of our Church's Rescue Missions. Instead of telling his old friends of this new experience, he had created a division in his life by working at religion among one group of friends and feeling uncomfortable among others. This had induced fear of the consequences of mentioning Christ to certain people, had limited the power he enjoyed, and had created opportunity for certain old sins to creep back. Above all, it made self the chief object in ministry instead of God. Doubts naturally followed—doubts of God, of His love, and of His miraculous power.

It was not that knowledge of the way out was defective. The writer has had a fairly intimate knowledge of the teachings of the movements that have stressed the deeper life, and in fact felt rather superior to others, because his head information on these subjects was imagined to be rather complete. Criticism instead of being constructive was used as a defense mechanism to hide from himself or to excuse partially his own real failure.

The disconnected amount of activity in evangelism—preaching missions, personal work and the like, served as an excuse for the rest of his life, he felt that God would be lenient with the unsurrendered part in consideration of the work done. These resting places failed and at last it was necessary to talk the matter out with some one who would not take it for granted that, just because he was a minister and apparently interested in evangelism, no more would be needed. He did know Christ and there had been some real victories, but never in the many times he had knelt to say "I surrender" could he arise feeling that he meant it.

Just two weeks ago at Calvary Church the matter was threshed out with one of the members of the staff, the fear, self-consciousness, and pride were committed to God in faith that God's power would remove them. He had expected some great emotional experience, or some voice from above, neither came, but just a realization that the fears had gone.

The surrender has been progressive. Day by day areas have opened up that were before unsuspected. It was as though a series of knots in his brain were being unravelled one by one. The whole experience has brought a new sense of God's power to set free. He feels like a beginner in many ways, as it has made such a difference in the way in which he views certain things in the past, but he is learning the truth that the future is in God's hands. Above everything else comes the firm conviction that the whole process has been not of self but of God.

BISHOP LUCIEN LEE KINSOLVING.

The Rt. Rev. Lucien Lee Kinsolving, D. D., first Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Brazil, where he labored for thirty-seven of the forty years of his active ministry, died in the late afternoon of Wednesday, October 18, at his home in Forest Hills Inn, Forest Hills, L. I., of a cardiac ailment from which he had long suffered. He was sixty-seven. Surviving are his widow, who was Miss Alice Brown, of Mount Holly, N. J., at their marriage in 1892; a daughter, Miss Lucy Lee Kinsolving; two sons, the Rev. Arthur Kinsolving, chaplain of the United States Military Academy at West Point, and Charles Kinsolving, a banker, and two brothers, the Rev. Arthur B. Kinsolving of Baltimore and the Rev. Wythe L. Kinsolving of Richmond, Va. The late Bishop Kinsolving of Texas was a brother.

Bishop Kinsolving, who was a cousin of General Robert E. Lee, leader of the Confederate Armies, was born in Loudoun County, Va., a son of the Rev. Dr. O. A. Kinsolving, an Episcopal minister in Virginia for half a century. After leaving the Episcopal High School of Virginia at nineteen, he spent four years at Beattyville, Lee County, Ky., establishing a Church School, and it was while grappling with the rough social and religious conditions of this out-of-the-way community that he heard the call to become a minister.

At the end of another four years he was a graduate of the Theological Seminary of Virginia, a member of the Episcopal ministry, and, with his seminary classmate, James W. Morris (at present assistant minister of the Church of the Epiphany, Washington, D. C.), was ready to set out for his post of missionary in the State of Rio Grande do Sul, Brazil, there to establish a new branch of the Protestant Episcopal Church on the Western Hemisphere. The vision of such a work had captured his imagination some months before his ordination, and his friend, Dr. Morris, had rallied to the same appeal.

Ten years later Mr. Kinsolving was consecrated in St. Bartholomew's Church, New York City, as Missionary Bishop for the Brazilian Episcopal Church. In 1907 he was elected Missionary Bishop of Southern Brazil. For twenty years of his service the Bishop traveled widely over Southern Brazil, founding churches, developing congregations and furthering education.

He helped establish the Southern Cross School and the Diocesan Theological School at Porto Alegre, where he made his home for many years. Entering a virgin field, he and his associates spread the influence of their Church so effectively that theer are now in Bishop Kinsolving's territory 3,286 communicants, 31 clergymen, most of them Brazilians; 90 parishes and missions and 51 Sunday schools, besides other schools.

In 1926 the Bishop was forced by failing health to return to the United States, hoping that a rest would enable him to continue his far-away work. He did not sufficiently recover his strength, however, and his resignation was accepted in October, 1928. His assistant, the Rt. Rev. W. M. M. Thomas, D. D., was elected to succeed him.

Funeral services were held in St. Luke's Church, Forest Hills, at 4 P. M., on Thursday. Burial was at the Theological Seminary, Alexandria, Va., Friday noon.—New York Times.

CHRISTMAS—1929.

More than nineteen hundred years ago the sweetest, divinest music ever heard by human ears swelled over the plains of Judea, as a multitude of the heavenly host, stretching down like a mighty ray of light from heaven to earth, sang to the shepherds tending their flocks:

"Glory to God in the highest,
And on earth peace to men of good will."

And when this angel choir, this "multitude of the heavenly host", ending their song of "Glory to God", went back to the heavenly land, shepherds found that wrapped in swaddling clothes in a manger in Bethlehem was a baby whose birth had been heralded by the song of the angels' chorus.

And who was this baby whose coming to earth had been thus announced as that of no other child ever born? It was the Creator of the universe, for the Bible tells us that Christ was the "creator of all things that were created". Enwrapping Himself in mortality, He came down to earth and gave Himself a ransom for the sins of mankind.

Astronomers tells us that there are stars so distant that light from them traveling at the rate of 186,000 miles a second, or equal to a journey seven times around the earth every second, takes a million years to reach the earth. They tell us that there are stars with a diameter of a million miles as compared with the 8,000-mile diameter of this earth, and that recent telescopic developments have brought into human view 60,000,000 stars never before seen by the human eye.

Christ, the Creator of all these vast worlds and the illimitable universe which no finite mind can grasp, took on Himself the form of humanity that He might offer redemption to the sinning world. Well, therefore, is it that the Christmas season should stir the heart of every human being. Well is it that it should be a day of profound reverence, of the deepest religious convictions, of a heartfelt desire to serve God by serving humanity. It is not a day for merry-making in the ordinary sense of the word merry, but a day for unalloyed happiness; a day for sending a message of peace and good will to the sick and the suffering; of carrying the material things of life as well as the spiritual to the poor and needy; of stretching the utmost power of our ability, mental, physical and financial, to help those in need from poverty or physical or spiritual sufferings, and make them feel the Divine light of Christmas Day.

"Hark! the herald angels sing!"
"Glory to God in the highest,
And on earth peace to men of good will."

COMPETING CREEDS

By the Reverend R. J. Campbell, D. D.

(Reprinted from "The Church of England Newspaper".)

ONE of the strangest facts of our time, for him who has eyes to see, is the indulgence wherewith views subversive of the Christian faith and all its implications are treated in the Church and in academic and literary circles. You can awaken far more indignation by questioning the right of Parliament to legislate for the Church in the matter of doctrine and worship than by drawing attention to the teaching daily given through the Press and the stage on what is most vital and fundamental to human welfare—teaching flatly opposed, not only to Christianity, but to all religion and to most that we have been brought up to regard as true ideals and canons of conduct. This has puzzled me for a long time, and I can only account for it on the supposition that people in general do not see the issues clearly or are comparatively indifferent to them.

> Clergy and laity alike among professed adherents of the religion of Jesus Christ are accustomed to listen with deference to persons of distinction whose teaching if universally accepted would mean the complete demolition of all that we have hitherto understood as Christian in religion and morals. They will praise and admire the brilliance of these persons with smiling complaisance, but will fight to the death over the supposed Romanizing tendencies of the 1928 Prayer Books.

Has our sense of proportion vanished, or what is it that accounts for these divagations?

> I have long been of opinion that those who fear the encroachments of Rome in this or any other country are blind to the real state of things. Rome is not gaining. Relatively she may be, though I question even that; but in no part of Christendom today is there the slightest indication that Romanism is recovering the hold over the popular mind that it once had; clericalism will never resume control of civilization.

The enemy that spiritual religion has to reckon with now is not sacerdotalism in any of its forms; it is stark denial of the very foundations of religion as hitherto understood. If I had influence with any Anglican or Free Churchman today I would say: Don't waste your time in striving against an adversary who is no longer dangerous, or if dangerous is only so in a minor degree. The battle is joined on another front. What we have to do today is to try to save the younger generation from succumbing to the influence of beliefs and modes of life expounded and defended with great ability, but absolutely fatal to all that we esteem highest and best in human character, human aspiration, human achievement.

Mr. Alfred Noyes recently wrote in the Spectator a forcible and reasoned apologia for his own submission to the Roman discipline. After reading it I could understand better the vehemence of his attack on Bunyan and the Pilgrim's Progress in the Bookman last year. No man who writes as Mr. Noyes does about the grounds of his faith—not so much in Christ as in the Church—could stand Bunyan any more than Bunyan could stand him. For Bunyan Christ is central: For Mr. Noyes Christ hardly seems to be essential at all, so long as there is a living institution to guide mankind along lines of development that presumably Christ would approve. Bunyan loathed giants Pope and Pagan and was glad their power had been scotched. Faith in and adoring love to Christ was enough for him and almost all that interested him. Perhaps he would find, however, if he could return to earth today that giant Pagan has made a marvellous recovery, whatever may be true of giant Pope.

A somewhat remarkable book has recently appeared from the pen of Montgomery Belgion, a writer with whom I have had no previous acquaintance. It is entitled "Our Present Philosophy of Life" and consists for the most part of a radical criticism of contemporary tendencies in regard to fundamental values. The author's thesis is that in all civilized countries, not only has that view of life which we have hitherto been accustomed to call Christian been successfully challenged, but that it has been overthrown and abandoned by the majority and another view taken its place and been all but universally accepted. I think he is wrong in this. The Christian view is much more firmly held even among non-churchgoers than he allows for. But that he is right in his statement of the true nature of the change that has been passing over beliefs and manners in our time is I think beyond question. He does not tell us what he himself believes, but delivers himself of a trenchant analysis and exposure of the pretentions of the substitutes for Christianity which are being offered to us.

Within the last thirty years, he says, the chief social relations have undergone transformation. Instead of aiming to build character we now aim to respect and develop personality; sexual relations are being rapidly modified to the extent of rendering it no longer disgraceful for either men or women to contract irregular unions at their pleasure; divorce is ceasing to be regarded as either scandalous or regrettable; marriage is being flouted. Class consciousness has become intensified and is accompanied by fierce antipathies; the same is true of nationalism; more and more individual freedom is being subordinated to State action. The making of money is now openly confessed to be a career worthy of the best talent and ambition; material pleasure and satisfaction are the objects avowedly to be gained thereby. In sum then—so says the abovenamed censor of modern motives and maxims—the way of surveying life and its problems and addressing ourselves thereto which Christianity has inculcated for nineteen centuries and imposed upon civilization for at least sixteen has been rejected in favor of something totally inconsistent therewith. In other words men no longer believe in God or immortality in the Christian sense of either term.

> This, if I mistake not, is what impels brilliant intellectuals like Alfred Noyes, Sheila Kaye Smith and G. K. Chesterton to seek shelter in the Roman communion. They fear the influence of the modern Sadducee. Mr. Noyes says that the philosophy of life regarded as authoritative in the Church of Rome is the only one that can hold its own successfully against all others and gives to human nature a dignity and significance that the fleeting cults of today and yesterday do not.

No doubt he means the scholastic philosophy expounded by St. Thomas Aquinas, which forms the basis of accepted Roman doctrine and is indeed a marvellous fabric of mental labor.

I never appreciated it as such till I read the late Cardinal Mercier's great book on the subject. But its terms are those of a past age; nothing can breathe life into those dry bones again. The theme most worthy of note in connection with it is, not its minute elaborations, but the simplicity of its assumptions. Mr. Noyes is so far right: here is the invincible truth. But these assumptions are those of Christianity everywhere; they need no safeguarding, for they are founded on the bed-rock of the faith once for all delivered to the saints.

> Today's disguised atheism which gives the name of God to the forces of Nature and denies to the individual man any better expectation from life than can be expressed by his bank book or his old age pension will pass as other lies have passed in the presence of Him who is our way to the Father, the truth about God and ourselves, and the giver of the life that never dies.

THE PURPOSE OF CENTRAL CHINA COLLEGE

By the Right Reverend Logan H. Roots, D. D.

(Notes of an address by the Missionary Bishop of Hankow, a representative of the Founders, at the matriculation exercises in Boone Library, Wuchang, China, on November 1, 1929.)

CENTRAL CHINA COLLEGE is a cooperative effort of the Christian forces in Central China. It has the support, not only of the Wesleyan and the London Missions and the American Church Mission but also of the Mission of the Reformed Church in America, and the Yale-in-China Mission. All these Missions are now cooperating whole-heartedly in the College. This is a day of small things in education compared with the educational needs of China or compared with educational plans already made. We ought to ask ourselves, especially on such an occasion as this, "What is the purpose of Central China College? Why add another, to the many institutions and plans, some of them vastly larger and bound, in the course of time, to overshadow in their proportions, anything that the Central China College can ever hope to become?" Let me try to answer this question, first negatively, by saying what the purpose of the Central China College is not.

Our purpose is not to duplicate or rival or simply to add to government education. We honor the government for noble efforts made, even in these very difficult times, to establish and maintain institutions for higher education. We wish them success and we wish to cooperate with them in every practicable and friendly way. We do not criticize or wish to compete with them. We propose to abide by the law as duly established by governmental authority unless the law be such that we cannot conscientiously abide by it, in which case, of course, we would have to close our schools. This contingency we do not expect. We want to supplement government education in those matters which seem to us highly important and which it is impossible for a government to supply.

Again negatively, our purpose is not that of propaganda, which distorts and misuses education for some ulterior purpose. Propaganda is quite rightly and necessarily distinguished from "Missions". Propaganda is self-centered and carried on for the benefit of those who do the propaganda work. It is quite legitimate in commercial and also in political matters, but it is out of place in the high sphere of education or of religion. "Mission" springs from the sense of a divine summons and is carried forward under the sense of the Divine Call for the benefit of those to whom the Mission is sent. The purpose of Central China College is in this sense, not propaganda, but part of the Christian Mission, carried on under a humble sense of the Divine Call and for the advancement of the Kingdom of God.

Positively, the purpose of Central China College is the Education of the Whole Man.

This means education filled with the religious spirit and for us Christians it means Christian Education. Primarily our aim is parallel with that of secular education. It concerns itself with the thorough education of the body. We believe in physical education and we are glad to have on the faculty here a teacher whose specialty is physical education, for we recognize that without health and physical strength, an educated man works under a serious handicap. Good work and even leadership is possible under such handicaps. All honor to such men, men like Philip Snowden, who go lame throughout life and yet who win the prize of rendering noble service to their fellow man in spite of their physical handicap. But we believe in education which will, wherever possible, prevent or remove such handicaps and make the educated man's body the ready and effective servant of his mind and will. As is true of all educators, we believe whole-heartedly in the education of the mind. The College purposes to afford opportunities for the very best modern education in science, in philosophy, history, literature, art, economics and sociology. All this is essential and we abate not one whit of its importance. But this is not enough. It may make of our civilization a Frankenstein and issue in self-destruction. Modern man has to fear, not as his ancestors did, the beasts of the jungle. His most deadly enemies are rather his fellowmen—men highly educated in body and mind, but lacking in moral and spiritual character. Such education may simply lead to destructive and even self-destructive efficiency and in itself is, therefore, not enough. The lurid light of the World War has brought this home to every thoughtful man.

Fundamentally, our aim is religious. Radically—at its root—its motive is Christian. Secular, non-moral education must, we believe, be permeated with the religious spirit and in Central China College we propose to permeate it with the Christian spirit. Our ultimate aim must be to train and build up men and women of power, who can not only wield effectively the great energies which modern learning puts into our hands, but who will wield them always at the bidding of Love. This implies that our education must attend not only to the body and the mind, but also to the soul and the spirit, the moral and the religious capacities of our students.

In this connection I would call to witness the conclusions of the meeting held on the Mt. of Olives near Jerusalem in 1928—the enlarged meeting of the International Missionary Council—attended by between two and three hundred representative men and women from all parts of the world. We are happy today in remembering that one of the twenty delegates at that meeting representing China was our President, Dr. Francis Wei. One of the Commissions reporting to that conference dealt with the subject of religious education. In the course of its report, as finally adopted by the whole conference the following words appeared:

> "Religion, when worthy of the name, incorporates man's response to the eternal values of life. As such it is essential to education. Without it education will not be merely incomplete—it is almost a contradiction in terms. . . . ."
> "While we would not deny elements of worth existing in other religions we are convinced that Christianity alone can supply what education requires."

Christians worship the God of Truth and Love revealed in Jesus Christ. Without knowledge of the truth, man has no backbone; without love he lacks life, flesh and blood.

The Central China College, therefore, stands for a fully educated humanity. Its aim is to send forth into the life of China, men and women whose education gives them power and at the same time fills their hearts with the love which will always use that power to help and not to hurt, to serve and not compel service from others, to fulfill and not to destroy the highest of the Chinese people.

THE MESSAGE OF NOEL.

Bow, haughty head! proud lips, be dumb!
Hush, throbbing heart! thy peace is come!
Before thy portal Love Incarnate waits;
An infant's holy hand unbars thy stubborn gates.

Cease, busy brain, thy plans to weave!
Sleep, sordid world, and do not grieve
With thy vain struggles, selfish, fierce and wild,
Those who await the coming of the Holy Child.

Pray, faithful soul, to God on high!
Worship, true heart, thy Saviour nigh!
On sin's dark night behold our Day spring rise,
With love's eternal starlight shining in His eyes.

Shine, blessed star, on every heart!
Sing, angel host, good news impart!
In every land, by faithful ones adored,
Is born today "a Saviour which is Christ the Lord."

Hugh L. Burleson, Missionary Bishop.

FAVORITE SCRIPTURE VERSE.

(In this space each week will appear a favorite passage of Scripture as sent in by a different reader. Every one is, therefore, invited to send us their favorite verse. It is suggested all who can, join with the rest of us in committing to memory the verse which appears here each week, including its location in the Holy Book; and in due time your memory chest will be laden with choice, eternal treasures, indeed. "Thy word have I hid in my heart, that I might not sin against thee." Ps. 119:11.)

This week the following verse was submitted by

The Rev. J. W. Ware, of Orange, Virginia:

> "Now the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing, that ye may abound in hope, through the power of the Holy Ghost" (Romans 15:13).

Who will send one from the far-away places as well as very near us?

MAN'S SPEED AND NATURE'S SPACE

By Bishop W. A. Candler

MAN'S speed is contracting nature's space. Measured by miles the world is as wide as it ever was. "All things continue as they have been from the beginning of creation."

But by the modern means of transportation the earth has been contracted; and it grows less every day.

Swift ships fly across the ocean with unprecedented speed.

The "Graf Zeppelin" sailed over and around the world in twenty-one days; and but for some stops on the way the great air vessel might have completed the earth-compassing circuit in even less time.

The radio brings daily news of what the men of Captain Byrd's Expedition are doing in the frozen regions of the Antarctic Circle.

Thus, our planet virtually shrinks constantly as man's speed conquers space. Rapid transportation and speedy communication have brought the ends of the earth together.

The phrase, "the family of nations", is something more than a metaphor. If the nations are not members of the same household, they all are at least near neighbors now. Not one among them can live unto itself, or die unto itself.

What affects each concerns all. If one suffers, all suffer with it. A contagion in India, or a pestilence in China, may spread disease wherever man is found, except medical science should be able to check it.

The poverty of a people will divert the currents of commerce and diminish the profits of trade. On the other hand, the prosperity of one nation will promote the welfare of all mankind.

The World War showed how in our times there are no fire-walls between the nations by which conflicts and conflagrations can be confined to the lands in which they start. Hence forth, all wars must be, and will be, "World Wars". If Russia and China go to war, all other nations will be drawn into the blazing combat.

Moreover, the world wars of the future can not fail to be more terrible than any which have gone before in the martial history of mankind. Death-dealing devices will bring horrors which the imagination cannot exaggerate.

Man's inventions will work his destruction, unless some means be found to reduce the fierceness of his selfish passions and bring pacification of his mad combats.

He has generated already more physical power than he has developed moral strength to restrain it within safe lines or acquired spiritual vision to direct it to safe goals.

He needs purification in his heart before he can reach ends of peace and safety. He needs to learn anew that "the soul of all improvement is the improvement of the soul."

He may fly upon the wings of the wind, amaze earth and heaven by his achievements, gather all wisdom and knowledge, and acquire immeasurable treasure; but none, nor all, of these things will avail to make him holy or happy. He is the crowning creature of all creation; but he cannot retain this high station of honor, or meet its solemn responsibilities, except he submit himself to the will of his Creator.

Mere treaties, however skillfully framed and sincerely designed, will not suffice to bring peace on earth and good will among men. Treaties are too liable to become nothing more than "scraps of paper", when national contentions become greatly inflamed. Such covenants may foster peaceful sentiments under favorable conditions; but they are too frail to resist the force of international tornadoes which may blow upon the world when least expected.

Nor can commerce constrain nations to seek peace and pursue it. Commerce is shot through and through with selfish competitions; and selfishness can never be the antidote for war. Its rivalries do rather inflame, than pacify, the nations.

Even the discussion of adjusting "naval parity" between nations may easily provoke irritation and arouse angry contests.

There is no permanent peace possible for the world but by a universal religion revealed and ruled by the Prince of Peace.

Indeed, there is no religion among men that can become universal, except the Christian religion. All the pagan cults are limited by racial boundaries and ethnic prejudices.

This world of ours, now so closely compacted together, must be a Christian world, or, it will soon be no world at all.

There are vain dreamers who would have us believe that some sort of religious syncretism, or amalgamation of all religions, is the remedy by which the world is to be saved. But no such federation of faiths is possible, and, if it were possible, Christianity could not become a member of it.

Our supreme Sovereign and Saviour never authorized or directed, his followers to seek the help of the authors and agents of pagan cults to save the race of man. He does not ask, nor has he ever asked, the representatives of heathen superstitions to assist his servants in discovering God, and throwing up concrete high-ways along which benighted souls may pass easily to the dwelling place of the Heavenly King.

He sends forth His messengers to preach to all men in all nations His supreme salvation, and to declare to a sinful and sorrowful world that "there is none other name under heaven given among men whereby they must be saved."

The Apostles and the Primitive Church knew nothing of any confederation or combination of Christianity with man-made religions in order to provide a remedy for the sin and woe of mankind. On the contrary, they suffered martyrdom, because they proclaimed an exclusive revelation which had nothing in common with religions that were prevalent in the lands to which they carried the Gospel of Christ's redeeming love.

It is not the Gospel for the East, or the Gospel for the West; but Christ's light of life shines in the heavens as the Sun of Righteousness for the illumination of the whole world; and all men must joyously welcome its celestial radiance and walk gladly in its light.

While the earth shrinks in its geographic space, its religious needs become more imperative in their demands. As its area contracts and its contacts grow more close, its faith must become more pure and potent.

Our little world needs, as never before, a great salvation.

Its greatly accelerated speed will hasten its destruction unless it is directed by Jesus Christ, who alone is for it a safe and sufficient Pilot. He who stilled with His words the storm on the Galilean Sea, is alone able to speak peace to our tempestuous times.

What is needed for all mankind is that this supreme Christ be magnified by Christian faith and works; and that His supreme salvation be proclaimed to the ends of the earth with the power of the Holy Ghost sent down from Heaven. To His stature we can add nothing, and we should have no disposition to reduce it. Let us have done with the folly that would put Him on a level with Confucius and Buddha and Mohomet, or would set Him in their midst to confer with them on the best way to save the world. He can have no fellowship with them, nor can He approve the darkness of their heathenism, however its huge form may loom in its surrounding gloom. He is supreme, or He is nothing.

Let us have done with the petty liberalism and puerile rationalism in our land, which stick at the Virgin Birth of our Lord, evaporate His bodily resurrection into a mist or myth, explain away His Atonement, disintegrate His redemption, and denature His Gospel. The present is of all times the least capable of being converted and conquered by such feeble and forceless preachments of naturalism. The mighty powers of this age require a mighty Saviour to bring them out of the bondage of sin and subject them to the rule of God.

THE LIVING CHURCH ANNUAL, The Churchman's Year Book and American Church Almanac for 1930. Published by Morehouse Publishing Company, Milwaukee, Wisconsin. Paper, $1; Cloth, $1.50.

This Church Annual is a fine piece of work and a welcome yearly visitor. It involves vast labor and great accuracy, considering its extensive range. It represents the external Church in a large way, somewhat conducive to pride in those who glory in the outward appearance. Practically every question concerning the organization of the whole Church and of the separate dioceses is answered. It is a tie that binds. There are fine portraits of the presiding bishop and seven new bishops of the Church. The list of clergy is over six thousand.

Church statistics are unreliable. It is a difficult matter to determine whether the Church is gaining or losing in membership. However, that need not alarm us. The Founder of the Church has taught us to look at the reality of fellowship with Him and not be disturbed when we see the drift from the visible Church. That the Kingdom of Jesus—of God—should fail is not possible. This was proven at the cross when the chances against the truth, from the worldly viewpoint, were a thousand to one. But from the spiritual the Cross proved it safe. Love conquered, as always.

There are nearly two million of baptized persons in our Church. We think there are fully that number. Over a million and a quarter are registered communicants in parishes. At least a quarter of a million more are drifting. The statistical gain in communing membership is slightly over twenty-five thousand, not a large gain. It is about an average of four to each parish.

The baptisms show a loss of three thousand, three hundred and the confirmations a loss of two thousand—rather anomalous in view of the gain in communicants. It is the nature of statistics to behave occasionally in this way.

Many fine young men are offering their lives to the ministry. Christ's call to discipleship is always heard by some. There is a glory and a joy in having Him call and use us.

The Church (Sunday) Schools are not gaining. This fact, with the decrease in baptisms, is a serious condition. We hear the question frequently asked, "What of the future of the Church if children are not added in growing numbers?" The answer to this question is the same we gave above in the second paragraph. What is the remedy? Create Christian homes. How? In the same old way. Preach the gospel. Sow the seed diligently, faithfully. Some will find good soil. Purify the Church. Make it a house of prayer and not a place of business. Let the Church members learn to lift up Christ to men and women as a drawing power. Have the same faith in God that Jesus had all through His ministry, the faith that carried Him through the suffering of the cross in perfect trust.

THE BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER. Edition of 1929. Cloth. Pp. 598. Published by The Morehouse Publishing Company, Milwaukee, Wisconsin. Price, 25c. Other editions: In Entomax (insect resisting), 30 and 35 cents; Durotex, $1-$2; Genuine Goatskin Morroco, $2-$5.

The distinguishing character of these Prayer Books is the "cleartype" specialty of their printing. It makes an attractive appearance on paper commendably well laid and finished.

Page for page it corresponds with other editions by the Oxford and Cambridge publishing houses, so that in announcing the pages to the congregations as the clergy will have to do for some time to come, the certainty of uniformity may be assured.

This is not the place to comment upon the contents of the Prayer Book; so such consideration may be wisely omitted. In its own sphere, the Morehouse Publishing Company has done a good work.

SAINT PAUL: By Emile Baumann. Harcourt, Brace and Company.

Helpful, suggestive and at times highly illuminative of the inner faith of the great Apostle, this book presents no wooden figure created after the mind and too often the prejudices of the writer, but shows real insight and sympathy. The writer shares the faith of the subject. He sees clearly that all rests with our view of the Gospel that St. Paul taught and believed. If we deny that Christ rose from the dead, then never expect to understand Him, for the fact explains the faith.

The book is written as a running commentary, following the Apostle on his journeys, and containing much direct quotation. At times the author leans a trifle too heavily upon tradition, that does not, however, interfere with the main story. You will find it really helpful in the understanding of St. Paul and of his eventful life.

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letters to the Editor" will appear in our columns except those coming to us signed by writer.

A CALL FOR MEN OF COURAGE.

Mr. Editor:

In a recent letter one of our missionaries in China writes to me:

> "As I look over the general situation in the Mission, I get a shudder. We are not getting any new recruits, either clerical or lay, and the majority of the American clergy are well advanced in years. Are there no new people available for China? Can't you do something for us? Have the luxuriousness and comforts of our colleges and universities at home affected our young Church people to such an extent that they have become too soft to be willing to endure a little hardship for Christ and His Kingdom? It almost seems so, yet I can hardly believe it is so."

It is not so. But perhaps the clergy of the Church have not strongly enough placed before our college students the call to service in the foreign field. With this in mind, I want to commend the New Year Conference on the Ministry to be held at St. Paul's School, Concord, New Hampshire, January 3 to 6. Will not our Church people see to it that strong young men are sent to this conference? There it is sure they will hear the call to service in all parts of the world Kingdom of God.

WHAT SHALL BE THE TEST OF LOYALTY?

Mr. Editor:

From time to time, our Church papers publish articles and open letters in which the authors of such articles and letters question the loyalty of their opponents.

While this writer sometimes differs with his brethren, he prefers to believe that those with whom he differs are just as sincere, honest and conscientious in championing the propositions they advocate, as he is in championing something else. And he ever tries to remember that:

> In the estimation of the Judaizing party in the Apostolic Church St. Paul was disloyal, yet today we look upon him as the staunch defender of "the faith once for all delivered to the saints."
> St. Athanasius was persecuted as a disloyal heretic and banished by royal authority, yet the Trinitarian Creed for which he contended against the combined forces of Ecclesiastical and Temporal authority is today the accepted standard of Orthodoxy.
> Luther, so roundly denounced in his day as disloyal to the Church, is today honored by Protestants as the great champion of religious freedom who broke the bonds of ignorance and superstition that bound the Christians of his day and brought to light the liberty that is in Christ Jesus our Lord.
> Cranmer, Latimer and Ridley, burned at the stake by "Bloody Mary" for the crime of disloyalty, are no longer so regarded by the Church today.

So while this writer has not and will not repudiate the historic Faith of this great Church, he considers it most unbecoming in those who tamely accept the Revised Prayer Book that bears the imprint of Anglo-Catholicism and which definitely repudiates the faith for which the English martyrs suffered and died to denounce and brand as disloyal that group which has received the approval of General Convention.

We recognize the right of all men to differ with the Anglo-Catholics, even as we do, and to oppose them. But let us oppose them fairly, vigorously even, but let us not question their motives or brand them as disloyal for the test by which we measure their loyalty will not hold water.

A perusal of these articles reveals:

(a) the use of words and phrases, or terms and practices, not authorized in the Prayer Book,
(b) the observance of Holy Days not authorized in the Prayer Book,
(c) the failure to conform to the Thirty-Nine Articles, are by these writers denounced as acts of disloyalty. I will not apply those test which the critics have applied to the Anglo-Catholics and I believe all thinking men will agree with me that the critics themselves are as guilty in some respects as those whom they denounce are in others.

Let us face THE FACTS squarely:

It is true:

(a) That Anglo-Catholics celebrate the Lord's Supper at an Altar, although the Communion Office specifies the Holy Table. So do their critics.

(b) That Anglo-Catholics use Eucharistic Lights, although the Prayer Book does not authorize them. So do their critics.

(c) That Anglo-Catholics teach their choirs to turn to the Altar when they sing the Gloria or recite the Creed, although the Prayer Book does not so authorize. So do their critics.

(d) That Anglo-Catholics make an act of reverence to the Reserved Sacrament. It is also true that some of their critics make a reverence to the Altar and to the Processional Cross, although the Prayer Book does not so authorize and the second commandment plainly condemns the practice.

(e) That Anglo-Catholics actually have the "nerve" to call the Lord's Supper "The Mass". As that is most certainly the correct title for the Revised Communion Office, why find fault with them for being honest in their selection of a title? Has honesty in the Church become a crime and since when? Does the picture of a horse have to bear a label for us to recognize it? Does "The Mass" have to bear the label for a Protestant to recognize it? Is it not high time to stop this ostrich policy of refusing to admit a fact when see it by the simple expedient of refusing to look at it?

(f) That Anglo-Catholics call their services "Low Mass," "High Mass," Benediction, etc., and that these terms are not in the Prayer Book. It is also true that some of their critics have A Eucharist, A Choral Eucharist, Evensong, although none of these titles are authorized in the Prayer Book Offices.

(g) That Anglo-Catholics use a Monstrance, a Tabernacle, a Sanctuary Lamp and various other items not authorized by the Prayer Book. It is also true that some of their critics have borrowed from them an Altar, a Credence Table, and Acolytes, although none of these terms are authorized in connection with the Communion Office.

(h) That the Anglo-Catholic reserves the consecrated elements, although the rubric plainly forbids the practice. It is also true that the rest of us consume the remainder of the consecrated elements personally, although the rubric plainly states that "the Minister and other communicants" shall jointly do so. If the Protestants disregard one part of the rubric, why is it treason for the Anglo-Catholic to disregard all of it?

Again I say, let us face The Facts, that if the Anglo-Catnolics are guilty of ignoring the letter of the Prayer Book, so are the rest of us. Let us also admit that the rest of us have simply followed the Anglo-Catholics in departing from the letter of the Prayer Book. They have been the leaders and we the followers: albeit, somewhat haltingly, nevertheless we followed their lead.

Years ago they began to observe "days" not authorized in the Prayer Book. They applied titles not found in the Prayer Book, i e., "Passion-tide," "Passion Sunday," "Palm Sunday." All of them terms borrowed from Rome, and the Protestants like them so well that they accept a Revised Prayer Book with those terms in them. Is it too much to expect that after they have accustomed us for awhile to "The Feast of Corpus Christi," "All Souls' Day," and other terms, customs, practices, at which we now balk, that we will also in the end again tamely eat out of their hands; and again "ostrich-like", stick our heads in the sand and say, "I do not see any great change."

If the Protestants who criticise the Anglo-Catholics are genuinely honest in their contention that "nothing should be permitted except that authorized by the Prayer Book", then let them get busy and clean house themselves; let them remove the altars; the credence tables; the eucharistic lights; stop using acolytes; stop bowing to altar and cross; stop turning to the altar when they recite the Creed; stop using titles not used in the Prayer Book and begin literally to obey the letter of the Prayer Book. If they are not willing to do that themselves, then let them admit they are not honest in their criticisms. For it is most certainly unfair to deviate yourself from the Prayer Book and then find fault with others who deviate therefrom. "People living in glass houses should not throw stones."

If the Tihtry-Nine Articles are to be the accepted standard, and this Protestant would like to see them universally so recognized, then we will have to face this fact:

The Revised Offices teach one thing and the Articles something else in some very important particulars.

And any man who literally tries to observe ALL that the Articles teach and ALL the Revised Offices teach will have to perform a feat in mental gymnastics that would do credit to an expert contortionist.

Lt us face the FACT and admit:

(a) That Articles forbid MASSES; but that the Revised Offices provide for Masses galore; Nuptial Masses, Requiem Masses and various other varieties. Any students of liturgics knows that the Revised Communion Office is "THE MASS."

(b) That the Articles state, "Wherefore, the sacrifice of Masses, in which it was commonly said that the priest did offer Christ for the quick and the dead, to have remission of pain or guilt, were blasphemous fables and dangerous deceits." Yet every time the Psalmist says the Communion the Revised Book requires him to "offer" the elements and to say a prayer for the Departed. It also authorizes Requiem Masses. Does any thinking Protestant believe that the Articles will nullify the plain teaching of the Office?

Let us face the Fact and admit it:

That the Articles forbid Invocation of Saints and Mariolatry, stating they are "grounded upon no warranty of Scripture, but rather repugnant to the Word of God." YET the Revised Offices provide for Prayers for the Departed. As both Prayers for the Departed, as well as Prayer to the Departed, i. e., Invocation of Saints and Mariolatry, are based on the same source, The Traditions of the Church, not the Word of God, does any one seriously think having admitted the one we can successfully prohibit the others. Thinkers must eventually face this: if my prayers will help the departed, theirs will help me." Those things stand and fall together.

That the Articles denounce Purgatory: Yet the Revised Office provide for Prayer for the Departed. If the Departed are not in a place of purging or cleansing WHY PRAY FOR THEM? IF they are, then why tremble at the word Purgatory?

Shall we command our Priests to PRAY and then forbid them to THINK, or to believe that their prayers are worthwhile?

If we do not believe in a Purgatory let's remove Prayer for the Departed from the Book as our Protestant forbears did. If we want Prayers for the Dead, then stop criticising those intelligent enough to see that Purgatory and Prayers for the Departed stand or fall together.

Protestants, if you are really sincere in your opposition to Anglo-Catholic doctrines and practices, then have the NERVE to stand with me for THE ARTICLES and absolutely and unequivocally opposed to the Revised Offices. FACE THE FACTS SQUARELY IN THE FACE, admit that the Revised Book is a break with the Protestant Faith of the Church and a definite turning to Anglo-Catholicism; stop beating the air; stop finding fault with trivial, petty things, and turn your energies to the task of making this an out and out Protestant Church with no compromise whatever with any who oppose Protestantism. Stop calling names and work for something definite.

Let us FACE THESE FURTHER FACTS:

(a) That the Prayer Book of 1552 marked "a complete spiritual revolution" in the Church of England.

(b) That the revolution resulted in: (1) The removal of altars, images, relics from the churches, (2) The abolition of The Mass and everything associated therewith, to-wit: Prayer for the Departed, to the Departed, the destruction of the Canon of the Mass. (3) Renouncing The Mass Vestments, the doctrines of Purgatory, The Sacrifice of the Mass, Transubstantiation, etc.

(c) That today the Church has restored: Altars everywhere, Lights everywhere, Images and relics in some places, The Mass with Prayers for the Departed and the Canon everywhere, although still afraid to admit it. Mass Vestments in some places. And is pressing on to the recovery of everything that Protestantism repudiated. Let us admit the fact.

Let us recognize THE FACT that the Revised Prayer Book is merely one more step in the program of the Anglo-Catholic Party looking to complete destruction of the Protestant character of the Church.

Let us admit THE FACT that Protestants for years have been on the defensive with no constructive program, simply contenting themselves with today criticising some innovation of the Anglo-Catholics and tomorrow adopting those same practices themselves.

Commenting upon a previous article of mine an Anglo-Catholic states:

> "Even with the not to be despised backing of The 'Southern Churchman' no Protestant reform is going to be worked in the Episcopal Church in the twentieth century. We saw that sixty years ago, when the Reformed Episcopalians made their schism."
> "Anglo-Catholics, while devoutly thankful for the work of the Prayer Book revision, as far as it has gone, are by no means satisfied" (black ours).

And I might add that no genuine Protestant should be satisfied with a Book that repudiates the very principles upon which Protestantism rests.

Sixty years ago Protestants were in control of the Church. The above quotations reveals that neither the Protestants nor the Anglo-Catholics were satisfied. Both wanted a change. The leaders deluded themselves with the rhetorical assertion that this was "a comprehensive" Church, ceased to be a "comprehending" Church; refused to face the facts; became a group of stand-patters—forever opposing, never proposing; fighting against, never for; on the defensive instead of being militantly aggressive; and so they, the Anglo-Catholics seeing the need for action began to act.

Yes, the Anglo-Catholics acted. Protestants criticised, then acquiesced, and one by one accepted practically everything the Anglo-Catholics proposed. The General Convention took notice of that fact and has now legalized the very things that Protestants once so roundly denounced.

FELLOW PROTESTANTS, I challenge you to courageously face the fact that the Revised Prayer Book is merely a patched up compromise, a continuation of the middle of the road policy that eventually drives out of the Church the most zealous Anglo-Catholics on one hand and the most zealous Protestants on the other: leaving the great mass of the Church composed of those who are indifferent and careless. The Anglo-Catholics long ago realized this was not a healthy condition; that something ought to be done about; It is time that we should recognize the same thing.

Here is a letter from a loyal Protestant Episcopalian in Alabama:

> "I am one of the Protestant Episcopalians who cannot conscientiously accept the Revised Prayer Book.
> "I feel that I have been robbed of a precious heritage."
> "I have been trying to get people interested in the Protestant Episcopal Church League, of which I am a member, and I have certainly had my eyes opened. I did not realize there were so many cowards among both clergy and laity. Ministers will not discuss it and discourage all attempts to get the facts before the pews.
> "Advent is almost here and I cannot make up my mind to go to Church."

Speaking of Prayers for the Departed, she says:

> "Roman Catholics jubilant of course. 'You will soon come ALL the way' they told me."
>
> "And my Protestant friends are sorry for all of us who have been betrayed."
> "Oh, I am more heart-sick and homesick this Advent-tide than I can tell you."
> "Some of my best friends think it so foolish to look at the situation as I do. Well, I think any one who won't face the facts is crazy, so we are quits."

And the Protestants—either utterly indifferent; blindly refusing to admit the facts; or wasting their energies in calling names; in fighting petty things.

Protestants, I who am a Protestant, challenge you to:

> STOP "straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel"; to stop fighting petty things and BEGIN TO FIGHT FOR the eternal, abiding, principles of the Protestant Reformation which abolished Prayers for the Dead, The Mass and everything associated with it.
> STOP opposing; stop being eternally on the defensive; and begin to propose something definite, something constructive, something worthwhile.

I propose that we give the Church immediately:

> A Profestant Communion Office.
> A Protestant Burial Service.
> A Protestant Office of Instruction.
> A Protestant Office for the Visitation of the Sick.
> That we stand resolutely, shoulder to shoulder, for all the eternal, abiding, principles of the Protestant Reformation.
> That we refuse to use any Book containing Prayers for the Departed.
> That we refuse to put such a Book in the hands of our children.
> That we adopt a definite, constructive program for reunion with our Protestant brethren of other denominations.

If we will put forward a constructive program and ACT QUICKLY; if we will back up Judge Marsilliot with our money; by the time next General Convention meets we can adopt a Protestant Prayer Book that will be acceptable to Protestant Episcopalians.

Our only hope for success is to stop compromising; stop fighting the small things that are the natural out-croppings of the present revision and begin to FIGHT FOR SOMETHING WORTHWHILE.

On the other hand, if the Protestants in the Church are so dead; so lacking in courage; so afraid of the powers that be that they are willing to "bow the knee to Baal," then it is about time for them to take a back seat and keep quiet.

Rev. F. W. Neve, D. D.,
Ivy Depot, Va.

Dear Dr. Neve:

This is just a word to tell you how heartily I agree with the papers which you are publishing in The Southern Churchman. The haziness in the air is making some people pagans and others Roman Catholics. What tremendously different points of view there are in our own Church today. I suppose you read Mr. Langbourne Williams' editorial about the recent mix-up at St. George's Church in New York. I must say that I see no harm in speaking out.

VALUABLE FRIEND.

Mr. Editor:

. . . . I have been a subscriber and a constant and highly pleased reader of your valuable paper for more than forty years. I hope to continue my subscription for the balance of my life, if I can pay for same, as I know of no other Church paper I care to read, other than yours. If it ever fails to come to hand by mail, I feel almost as if I have lost a valuable friend.

Further Reports From Dr. Glazebrook.

Dr. Larkin W. Glazebrook, on a missionary tour of the far western dioceses as emissary of the National Commission on Evangelism, sends another report, and writes: "This is a great life. God has been most good in giving me great opportunities. An ordinary layman is being heard—'Gladly' This should encourage others. Keep me and my work in your prayers."

The report is addressed to Bishop Stevens, telling of the evangelist's trip to the Diocese of Los Angeles.

Reached Los Angeles at 12 M. Saturday, November 16. Joined my wife and daughter at their apartment.

At 4 P. M. went to the residence of the Rev. and Mrs. Covell at Pasadena, where, at a reception, they gave me the pleasure of meeting many of our Church people. For several years I was privileged to work with these two friends in the Diocese of Washington.

Sunday, November 17, I attended the early service at St. Paul's Cathedral; afterwards breakfasted with the St. Andrew's group and spoke to about forty men and boys.

At 11 A. M., through the courtesy of Dean Beal, I was privileged to speak from the Cathedral pulpit to a congregation of 900 people.

At 5 P. M. I spoke to the congregation of St. Stephen's Parish, Hollywood; there were about seventy-five present; I enjoyed greatly the excellent music rendered by their choir.

November 18 motored to Huntington Park, where I was privileged to speak to a group of eighty Rotarians; many pleasant reactions followed.

At 7 P. M., at the University Club, I addressed seventy-five members of my fraternity (A. T. O.); again several worthwhile contacts were made.

November 19, at 12 M., attended the luncheon of the Bishop's Guild and was privileged to address a splendid group of 300 women. Bishop Stevens was present and kindly introduced me and spoke of my mission in his diocese. At 4 P. M. the Rev. Mr. MacDonald called and took me to the Diocesan Home for the Aged, where Deaconess McKinley gave me the opportunity of speaking to the thirty guests and to whom I handed one of the Jesus' cards. At 6 P. M. I dined with the Rev. and Mrs. Parke, and later spoke to a congregation of seventy-five at the Church of the Angels; was much impressed by the beauty of the grounds and church building.

November 20, with Mrs. Covell and Mrs. Sanford and my family, we drove to Riverside and lunched at the Mission Inn, and were shown through the Government home for Indian girls and boys, 1,000 of them being splendidly cared for. At 6:30 P. M. I spoke to a splendid group of 140 in the Parish Hall of St. Michael's Church, Anaheim; three rectors from Orange, Santa Anna and Fullerton with their people were present. At 10 P. M. I spoke to 400 men at the Midnight Mission.

November 21, at noon, attended the luncheon of the men of the Diocesan Bishop's Guild and was privileged to address them; there were about fifteen clergy and seventy-five men present.

November 22 visited the Huntington Gallery with my family in the afternoon, and was greatly interested in this most interesting place. At 8 P. M. addressed a group of twelve men at the residence of Dean Beal, who holds these small group meetings frequently at his home; for his men.

November 23 spent the day sight-seeing; went to Hollywood Cemetery to pay my respects to the memory of one of the Founders of my Fraternity, Judge Erskine M. Ross; visited the Clark Mausoleum; after lunch attended the game between Occidental and Pomona Colleges. At 11 P. M. took sleeper for San Diego.

November 24 met by the Rev. Mr. Barnes, rector of St. Paul's Church. At 11 A. M., spoke to the seventy-five children of his Sunday School and at 11 A. M. addressed a splendid congregation of 350. Here I met several old friends from the East. At 2:10 took train for Santa Anna, where I was met by the Rev. Perry Austin and motored to Long Beach. At 8 P. M. I spoke in St. Luke's Church at a union service of our churches there; it was a splendid congregation of 450. Spent the night at the hospitable home of the rector and his family.

November 25 visited the Seamen's Church Institute and was hospitably received by its splendid superintendent, the Rev. Mr. Kelly. I then enjoyed a delightful ride about San Pedro and through the oil fields back to Los Angeles.

November 26, 7 P. M., attended a diocesan dinner, given in the Parish Hall of the Cathedral, given in my honor. There were about twenty clergy and 120 laymen. This was an outstanding opportunity and my message was most graciously received.

November 26 drove sixty miles with the Rev. Mr. Osborne to Riverside to be present at a meeting of a Convocation. Through the courtesy of the Bishop and Dean, I was privileged to address the fifteen clergy and 100 lay people present. Bishop Barnwell also spoke.

November 27 lunched with Dr. Lobingier, an outstanding layman at his club. At 4 P. M. my friend, Dr. McCord motored us for a drive and later attended a dinner given me by my Fraternity Chapter at Occidental College. I spoke to a splendid group of twenty-five college men.

November 28, Thanksgiving Day, attended services at the Cathedral and listened to a fine sermon by the Dean. Later, with my family, dined with the Dean and his family; we were then treated to a delightful drive to Santo Monica, the ocean front and through the University of California grounds. (A rather interesting experience happened in the morning. My wife, at 8:30 A. M., asked me to go to the Commissary in the apartment and get a loaf of bread for our breakfast. As I gave the order to the clerk, I heard a voice clearly say, "Ye cannot live by bread alone"; turning to the radio I heard my Bishop (Freeman) preach from this text from his pulpit at the National Cathedral in Washington, his Thanksgiving Message. Science and religion brought a wayfarer 3,000 miles away, home again.)

November 29 had a splendid conference with an outstanding layman from the Diocese of Quincy, relative to the work of the laity. Attended the Rotary luncheon. At 4 P. M. the Rev. Mr. Osborne called and took us for a delightful drive and to dine in his hospitable home.

November 30, Mrs. Stevens (the Bishop's wife) called and offered us her home at Delmar for my vacation period, during the Christmas period. At noon an old University friend, whom I had not seen for many years, called and took us to his beautiful home, "Edge Hill", Bon Air, where we lunched with his family and drove afterwards. At 10 P. M. I boarded my train for Fresno, California, in order that I might begin my mission in the District of San Joaquin, the next morning.

Many glorious opportunities were given me in this diocese. I cannot go on my way without expressing to Bishop Stevens, Dean Beal (the Chairman of the Diocesan Commission on Evangelism), the many clergy and lay people my heart felt thanks for their cordial hospitality; their real zeal in the reception of the Message of Evangelism, which I, a layman, was privileged to deliver. I am convinced that all alike, will carry on this great challenge and will emphasize even more than ever His great command: "Go . . . Seek . . . Bring into the fold My lost children."

CHURCH OF ENGLAND NEWS.

The Lambeth Conference.

(S. C. London Correspondent.)

With the Lambeth Conference drawing nearer there is a quickening of interest in its probable proceedings. There are several points upon which there may be expected to arise sharply divided counsels. There are already appearing dogmatic statements which, if they could be accepted, would at once settle the problems and save any amount of time and talk. But these frank and emphatic expressions of assured knowledge are often in direct opposition one with the other, and the need for calm and deliberative consideration such as is provided by the Lambeth Conference is necessary. It is a wise provision which secures that the Lambeth Conference decisions shall be reached slowly, and with a break for change of scene and thought as well as for committee work in the middle of the Conference. It may be specially desirable this next Conference, as it seems likely that the Conference will be forced to make a decision more momentous than on any previous occasion. While not belittling the importance of the first two sections of the Agenda, which deals with The Christian Doctrine of God and The Life and Witness of the Christian Community, individual and corporate, in the fulfilment of the Divine purpose (involving some very "thorny" subjects), it may confidently be said that Section III, which deals with The Unity of the Church, exceeds them in importance and is fraught with far graver possibilities than perhaps any subject which has hitherto been before this great gathering of Bishops. The Section which follows on The Anglican Communion, may be charged with an unanticipated import as an outcome of what takes place under the preceding section. It is difficult yet to forecast what is likely to take place in regard to the Re-union problem, but no words can exaggerate what it may mean to the cause of the Christian Church, for weal or for woe the world over. It is not too much to say that the future of the Church of England in the mission field depends upon the decisions of the Bishops in the Lambeth Conference on this subject. With Re-union so much in the air, it is not surprising that much is forthcoming for and against every scheme of Re-union. In principle all are agreed in the desirability of Re-union. When, however, it comes to practical details, there is much diversity of opinion. The only scheme, which can be regarded as practical politics, is the Scheme of Union put forth by the Joint Committee of The Church of India, Burma and Ceylon, The South India United Church and The South India Provincial Synod of the Wesleyan Methodist Church. All who are interested in the subject should read the official document put out by the Christian Literature Society for India (Madras) and easily obtainable through the usual channels. This official statement of the Scheme has an interesting and informative, though brief, summary of the history of events which have led up to the proposals.

Re-union in itself seems so eminently desirable, especially when the Mission Field is in view, that it might almost seem a matter of course. It is, however, far from that, and various knotty points spring immediately into prominence. Episcopacy is very much to the fore in conversation and discussions in religious circles and in the religious press. The doctrine of the Apostolic Succession has again become a battle-ground. And now it seems that Confirmation will, somewhat unexpectedly, take its place as a subject of acute controversy. Much will be heard of these and kindred subjects during the coming months, and it will be well if it leads people to examine them in the light of Holy Scripture and form for themselves an enlightened judgment.

Vocational Conference for Women.

Everywhere we hear the cry—"We need a trained woman worker." One who not only has a deep spirituality, but has learned how to impart something of her spirit to others.

Those who have been interested in work among College Students as a whole and the women in particular, have felt the need of presenting to them the vast field which is opening for trained women workers. On December 30, a vocational conference is to be held at Windham House, the graduate training center for women preparing for Church Work. At this time the qualification for such work will be presented Senior College Women.

Among the leaders will be the Rev. W. Russell Bowie, the Rev. C. Leslie Glenn, Miss Eleanor Bicknell, Prof. Adelaide R. Case, Miss Olive Dutcher, Miss Winifred Kirkland and others.

Individual and general invitations have been sent to Senior Girls who might be interested in answering the question of "After College What?" with one of the many types of service which our Church now offers.

Alaskan News.

The Rev. Dr. John W. Chapman, senior in service, by many years, of all the mission staff in Alaska, sends various items from his home at Anvik:

The message from the Department of Missions announcing the death of Bishop Murray reached Anvik the day before All Saints, but on account of exceptionally strong interference, I got only part of it. I understood that there was to be a memorial service, and it seemed appropriate to make it part of the All Saints' Day Service. The day after that was a favorable one and I got the full text.

The newly built chancel of Christ Church, Anvik, was used for the first time on November 10.

Through the mission radio we hear plenty of amateurs in California and other western stations, and I have set up a long-wave receiver which brings in press dispatches as well as those from Holy Cross and other military stations in Alaska; so I can tell what is going on, far or near.

On October 31, the mail man came up from Holy Cross. He reported that the ice was too thin to bear him, in places, so that he was obliged to get down and crawl on hands and knees, distributing his weight by the use of long poles. Of course we gave him a light pack and I presume that he reached Holy Cross in safety, for I heard two telegrams being sent from there which I sent down for transmission.

The Roman Catholic Mission is to have an airplane of its own, with headquarters at Nulato.

As we enter the dark period of the winter we are better prepared for it than usual. The new Delco machine gives us an abundance of light. Our houses have been made rather more comfortable than last winter, and the Nenana coal is very much superior to the coal we used before. We have an abundance of coal and wood. A heater of greater capacity has been installed in the basement of the mission residence and the smaller one will be put at work elsewhere.

On November 15 we heard by radio of Bishop Anderson's election as Presiding Bishop. We think that the choice is a very good one.

Bishop Kinsolving Passes On.

The Rt. Rev. Lucien Lee Kinsolving, retired missionary bishop of Southern Brazil, died on December 18, in Forest Hills, Long Island, New York. Ill health continuing when he came home on furlough late in 1926 led to his resignation, which was accepted by the House of Bishops at last General Convention. He was the first bishop of the district of Southern Brazil, and was one of the four pioneer missionaries who established and built up the work there. He was born in Virginia, in 1862, and educated there, graduating from the Virginia Theological Seminary in 1889. He was consecrated bishop on January 6, 1899, and served in that capacity for forty years. His suffragan, the Rt. Rev. William M. M. Thomas, was elected to succeed him at General Convention in October, 1928.

The Department of the National Council.

The following are the reports of some of the departments of the National Council, which held its regular meeting in New York City, December 11-12:

Finance Department: Dr. Franklin, reporting the state of General Church finances as of December 5, said that the Council had received $1,934,430 of the total of $2,829.693, which the dioceses and districts had said might be expected from them. This left a balance of $895,263 to be collected in the remaining weeks of the year. Dr. Franklin spoke optimistically of the prospect that practically all of this would be paid by the final closing of the books for the year. For the past three years the dioceses have paid an average of 98.7 per cent of what they told the Council to expect. The only cloud in the sky, he suggested, was that general business conditions were not nearly so good at the close of 1929 as during the preceding years. "Let us prove," he urged, "that the King's business comes first and that no temporary change in economic conditions can alter our determination to keep our pledges for the extension of His Kingdom."

Religious Education Department: Mr. Suter stated that "the Department itself consists of eighteen members. It has engaged the services of ten officers and two part-time consultants. Nine of these twelve are paid from the budget, but one of the nine receives only $200 a year. These twelve persons and their assistants do the central and creative thinking and bear the major burdens. The success of the Department's whole enterprise stands or falls with the quality of their work. Associated with us are one hundred and thirty-two volunteer Commissioners who come in from the field two or three times a year in small groups and give us a great lift, incidentally keeping us in touch with opinions and conditions of the field. In our child study work we have thirty-four research associates working for us in twenty-three dioceses. Furthermore, one hundred directors of Religious Education are registered with us. Practically every leader of young people is in direct touch with us, and we are responsible for the National Federation of Episcopal Young People, whose triennial convention we sponsor. The diocesan educational executive are all registered with us, and for them also we stage a triennial convention. There is a group composed of one or more educational leaders in each diocese or district, who handle the three national offerings. We run the N. A. T. A., in which 300 persons now hold full diplomas, and 4,900 persons certificates; 15,421 certificates have been awarded in all. Our library lends books to nearly a thousand people a year. We temporarily give financial support to six student pastors, and six women who work in colleges. We direct or advise seventy-two diocesan leaders of the isolated. We speak to at least two thousand educational leaders four times every year through the pages of our magazine, Findings in Religious Education. Thousands of children read our stories and look at the pictures and posters we publish, in connection with the three national offerings which the National Council has asked us to promote. Thousands of children in Church Schools all over the land receive instruction based at least in part upon the Christian Nurture Series, and hundreds of others follow the more flexible curriculum-guides, which we are always glad to provide. I began by mentioning twelve people here at the centre; but you see how the circles widen. A veritable network of relationships spreads over the Church, radiating from the educational broadcasting station called the Department of Religious Education. The range of our responsibilities would never be guessed from a glance at our budget; the two things are not commensurate. Neither would they be inferred from our name, for our work, as you have seen, is as much missionary as educational."

American Church Institute For Negroes: The Rev. Robert W. Patton, D. D., Director of the American Church Institute for Negroes reported many new and significant features in this great work. The entire community of Mound Bayou, Mississippi, has united to urge the establishment there of an Institute School. The entire community is made up of Negroes and eighty per cent of the population of the county in which Mound Bayou is located, are Negroes.

nity include generous gifts of land and cooperation in providing necessary buildings and equipment. A careful study of the proposal is under way.

Dr. Patton reported very material interest displayed in that section of the forthcoming Advance Work Program, which has to do with the work of the Institute. The beneficiaries, he said, would be Voorhees Normal and Industrial School, Denmark, South Carolina; Hoffman St. Mary's School, Near Mason, Tennessee; St. Paul's Normal and Industrial School, Lawrenceville, Virginia; Bishop Payne Divinity School, Petersburg, Virginia.

Dr. Patton reported an ever increasing financial support for the schools of the Institute made possible by the excellent field work being done by Mr. Wallace A. Battle.

Church Publicity: The Rev. G. Warfield Hobbs, on behalf of the Department of Publicity, reported that on December 1, there remained a gross cash balance in favor of the manufacturing account of The Spirit of Missions of $5,467, a record never before equalled. He reported that orders from the field for the current issue of The Church at Work reached a total of 601,927, the highest peak in the history of this national Church publication. He reported the issuance by the Department of a textbook, Publicty for the Church, written by the Rev. John W. Irwin, assistant secretary in the department, upon which a ten-hour study course had been built and was being offered as an N. A. T. A. summer school course. The executive secretary called attention to the types of graphs and charts being produced by the department on behalf of various branches of work under the National Council, which he said was proving one of the most popular forms of service being rendered.

Sheboygan, Wisconsin, Aids Lepers.

Seventeen Protestant Churches of Sheboygan cooperated in a unique form of interdenominational benevolence as a preparation for Christmas. On the suggestion of the daily Sheboygan Press each church during the autumn circulated among its members a small pig-shaped savings bank, one of one hundred procured by the newspaper from the American Mission to Lepers, at New York. Many schools and business houses did likewise. The result was the collection of many hundreds of dollars as a Christmas gift to lepers being cared for at 143 centers in forty-one countries throughout the world.

The second largest contribution made through these "pig banks" was from patients and visitors at St. Nicholas Hospital, whose thoughts were led from the illness and suffering there to the worse condition of the world's millions of victims of leprosy. The entire city has taken much interest in this unusual combination of journalistic enterprise and Christian humanitarianism.

Bishop Manning Defended Before Lutheran Synod.

The New York Herald reports that Bishop William T. Manning's recent ruling that a Presbyterian could not celebrate communion at an Episcopal altar was strongly defended by Dr. Frederick H. Knubel, president of the United Lutheran Church in America, in a sermon at the recent induction of officers of the newly retorganized United Lutheran Synod of New York, held at St. John's Lutheran Church, New York City.

"If the Episcopal Church holds that conviction we ought to honor its belief," he said. "We who are not of that communion ought not to aim to intrude upon what is holy to them and give them needless offense.

"Christian denominations need first of all to respect one another and above all one another's convictions. Only on the ground of mutual respect, can we begin to understand and to persuade one another."

Continuing his defense of Bishop Manning's action, Dr. Knubel said even Lutherans who "do not so believe concerning the ministry and ordination," should respect the sacraments of other denominations.

"This is one more of the many instances in which we are not bound at all by forms and ceremonies," he said. "We live only for the sake of the free gospel. We have in different parts of the world men in the ministry known as pastors, elders, bishops, archbishops, superintendents, presidents and even priests. To us this matters little. If called bishops and archbishops and priests, their ordination has made them in no wise different from all true ministers of the gospel anywhere and by any name."

Remember the New Year Conference.

When we consider the fact that no young man in the history of our beloved parish has ever entered the ranks of the sacred ministry of the Church and that this parish has furnished splendid and successful men to almost every line of endeavor and profession, it is time for us to stop and pray a little about it.

Why haven't the splendid sons of many of you parents given the matter of the ministry any consideration? If you can answer that in connection with your family life I presume that the same answer would hold so far as our parochial life is concerned.

It may be because you fathers yourselves have never thought of it in connection with your own boys and have never presented it to them. We earnestly beg you, fathers and mothers, to help us reach your boy once each year with this avowed purpose in mind. —(Rev.) Malcolm Lockhart.

Have you suggested to any College Student to attend the New Year Conference?

Theological Seminaries.

Enrollment at the Church's fifteen theological seminaries and training schools for the ministry is as follows, including all classes of men enrolled, graduate students, special students, etc.:

General, 155; Berkeley, 28; Nashotah, 29; Cambridge, 36; Virginia, 79; Seabury, 25; Pacific, 9; Bexley, 26; Sewanee, 17; Philadelphia, 61; Western, 30; Bishop Payne, 11; Delancey, 11; Greeley, 32; DuBose, 29.

The total number is 588. Last year it was 551; the year before, 546. The two seminaries which are crowded, General and Virginia, are also the two which are most active in the work of recruiting men for the ministry, in colleges and elsewhere. Further information as to educational standards in training and recruiting may be obtained from the office of the secretary for college work, the Rev. Leslie Glenn, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Woman Worker Wanted.

The rector of a church on the campus of a leading Eastern women's college is looking for a woman to assist him in his work among students. She would be appointed under the United Thank Offering, and, in addition to their requirements, should be a college graduate, possibly with additional training in theology and pastoral care. He has been looking for two years. Does any one know where such a person can be found? Correspondence may be addressed to the national secretary for college work, the Rev. C. Leslie Glenn, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York.

Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., Bishop

Church News in the Nation's Capital.

In one single week during November the Church of the Epiphany, All Souls, St. Margaret's, St. Andrew's and St. Stephen's were energetically engaged in the annual Church Bazaars and Turkey Dinners.

At the Church of the Epiphany the Bazaar for the benefit of the Parish Church Home, lasted two days, while the second, under the auspices of the Branches of the Diocesan Auxiliaries, held sway for three days. At this last, in the interest of missions, there was an attractive display from Brazil, Japan, China and other mission fields. The handwork from these poorly churched lands was a sermon in patience and tireless effort on the part of those who wrought such exquisite articles, despite their limited opportunity and lack of adequate equipment. With the exception of this missionary sale the proceeds of all the other church benefits were devoted to parish needs and indebtedness.

The Diocesan Church Home on Wisconsin Avenue recently held a successful bazaar and cake sale. Tea was served by the members of the Board of Directors, representing the various parishes. This is an annual event and an occasion of much pleasure to the household at the Home and to their friends.

Beginning with the Advent season the Washington churches are replacing their old Prayer Books and Hymnals with the revised edition. Many mission posts will fall heir to these superseded editions.

The Washington Cathedral has inaugurated a system of Pilgrimages each Sunday; one directly following the morning services and another in the late afternoon. These are conducted by a member of the clerical staff of the Cathedral, and intended to serve those visiting who are unable to visit the Cathedral and grounds during the week days, when the regular guides are in attendance.

The Young People's Society of the Church of the Epiphany meets every Sunday evening in the parish building. There is a program to encourage an open forum and a light supper is served before the regular church service begins. Students from the Theological Seminary in Virginia take an active part in this organization and the future clergymen and future laity are thus brought into close contact, which should be a

COLLECT FOR FIRST SUNDAY AFTER CHRISTMAS.

Al mighty God, Who hast given us Thy only begotten Son to take our nature upon Him, and as at this time to be born of a pure virgin; Grant that we being regenerate and made Thy children by adoption and grace, may daily be renewed by Thy Holy Spirit; through the same Our Lord Jesus Christ Who liveth and reigneth with Thee and the same Spirit ever, one God world without end. A NEW YEAR'S ANTHEM.

William Olney.

For a New Year in which to serve the Lord,
New time to search into His precious Word;
New days to spread the Name of Christ abroad:
God! we praise Thee.

For all the gracious gifts the New Year brings,
My faith in glad anticipation sings;
Praising the Sender of all "precious things":
God! we praise Thee.

For every help the twelve months will provide
To keep me closer to my Saviour's side;
That I "with Christ" to sin be crucified:
God! we praise Thee.

For the blest Gift which came at Pentecost,
The power and unction of the Holy Ghost;
Who this New Year will seek and save the lost:
God! we praise Thee.

For every test of patience, faith and love,
By which Thy Wisdom will our soul's life prove;
And for the strength which cometh from Above;
God! we praise Thee.

So shall the Year be companied with Grace,
Which will be ours till ends this mortal race,
And we be summoned to behold Thy Face!
God! we praise Thee.

Effective Preparation and Presentation of the Sunday-School Lesson.

Rev. Alan Pressley Wilson.

Part II.

You must know the lesson or you cannot teach it. That is a statement that no one will gainsay, yet how many, many teachers undertake to teach what they themselves do not know? If you do not know the lesson you cannot impart it and, what's more, if you do not believe what you are trying to teach (it matters not how well you know it); if you do not believe it, for the sake of Him who "went about doing good", give up your class and go into a Bible class until you can learn to believe. Over and over again pray this prayer, "Lord, I believe; help thou mine unbelief"! (St. Mark 9:24b.)

Lack of preparation and sincerity are more apparent to your pupils than you possibly can know. They do more harm than the knowledge of the subject can do good. Do not fool yourself into believing that you can go to the lesson without preparation and carry on the lesson without the boys and girls recognizing that you do not know what you are talking about. For, even though you are teaching the children of the Fiji Islanders, you have a bunch of youths who are alert and wide awake. They know that you do not know! Here is one of the things that makes one cause for the "flapper", the irreverent boy or girl. Too long have we thought of boys and girls as possessing undeveloped minds, whereas they have keen minds and sharp intellects. Sham and camouflage are very apparent and yet most distasteful, and the boy or girl who has been "fed up" on such a diet soon learns to disregard or disrespect you.

Here is a girl, for instance, who goes shuffling down the street in an immodest dress, exposing more of her person than common decency dictates. Why? I'll tell you why! It is because her elders, pastor, teachers, parents, have not kept up with her development. We all have tried to dish out common platitudes instead of "studying to show ourselves approved; workmen that need not to be ashamed". (2 Tim. 2:15.) This girl has unmasked us and knows that we have been lazy and careless and, while she was developing and learning at a rapid rate, we have been lolling and neglecting our own development. She is assured that she knows more than we do, and therefore flaunts her superiority. Get down on your knees, friends, and pray that God will remove this plague from our midst and forgive us that we are responsible for it!

In your preparation, be systematic. Systematic study a few minutes each day will do more for you than a hurried preparation on Saturday night, or, what is entirely too common, Sunday morning. Begin one Sunday to prepare for the next; read over the lesson text and other references; read the daily passages bearing upon the lesson; meditate upon the subject of the lesson each day; pray that God will teach the lesson to you that you may teach it to others.

Here is a poem-prayer that each one of us should make his own:

"Lord, speak to me, that I may speak
In living echoes of Thy tone;
As Thou hast sought, so let me seek,
Thy erring children, lost and lone!"

The teacher doing effectual work is one who gets and keeps a comprehensive knowledge of the year's (or, at least, quarter's) lessons. By keeping your eyes and ears open you will get much of value for the coming lessons. They belong in a series and the same strain of Christian teaching runs through all as do the red silk threads in a government bank note.

I suggest using thirteen envelopes, two being marked "Temperance" and "Missionary", respectively, the others being numbered 1 to 11. These will serve as containers for material or illustrations bearing on the quarter's lessons. As you read the daily papers or weekly magazines, religious journals or trade papers do so with the determination to clip (at once, or you will forget it or the paper be mislaid) anything bearing on the lessons for the next three months.

Better still, if you make use of a book of Lesson Helps, like Pelaubet or Tarbell, paste lightly an envelope in the front of each lesson section. Into these put pertinent helps from time to time. Index on the outside of each envelope its contents and leave there permanently. Over and over again you will find use for illustrations, outlines, etc., etc., you have saved on various topics and every now and then you will find the lessons on the same general subject. Only those who (like the writer) have tried this plan know what a mine of information it affords.

All of this is part of your equipment and should be recognized as such. The moment you make a crutch of equipment, just that moment do you begin to retrograde. Have plenty of equipment, but regard it as a help to your mind: not a crutch to a crippled, pampered intellect.

The effectual teacher also will have a good, substantial, working Bible with heavy back. This is for your study table, a Bible with soft leather binding and divinity circuit, is suitable for carrying to Sunday school, but not substantial enough for the wear and tear of constant study and reading. Have a good, up-to-date concordance, such as Young's or Walker's (although the Cruden's of our younger days is not even now to be despised. Get a dictionary of the Bible. Smith's or Kitto's may be much out of date when it comes to period of publication, but each one of these authors did his work thoroughly and one could not go astray in securing either one.

A commentary is a useful work, but not a necessity, and is recommended only for teachers of advanced classes of adults.

Use the concordance in the back of your Bible, or, one of the larger ones I have recommended, for collating related passages. Study the same incident as given by different authors. One of the evangelists, for instance, writing to one class of people, naturally views an incident or teaching of Jesus in the light of that people's need: another will put a different coloring upon the picture. A Harmonized Sequence of the Gospels should be used, for in such a work you will find the same incident treated by each evangelist given side by side in parallel columns. A good work of this nature is Broadus' Harmony of the Gospels and this is recommended for constant use whenever the lessons are taken from the New Testament.

The effectual teaching is that preceded by knowledge. Know your subject, then radiate it as a stove radiates warmth and for the same purpose, that others may be warmed.

If you know the lesson: if you have made honest and sincere preparation, you need not fear for its presentation. A well-informed teacher can no more fail in presenting the subject than can a well-charged battery fail to give out its power.

PRELUDE TO THE NATIVITY.

Eleanor Glenn Wallis.

Out on the hills the shadowy flocks are grazing
Beneath the stars,
And shepherds tell of bygone Jewish chieftains
And of old wars.

Within the town is darkness and a waiting;
Quiet at length defeats
The restless stirrings of strange, weary camels
In unfamiliar streets.

But where the ox is bedded and the she-ass
Lies down to sleep,
Those to whom late the inn refused its shelter
A vigil keep;

And far away a wise man lifts a perfume
From out his hoard;
While Herod dreams uneasily and, muttering,
Gropes for a sword.

A Year Comes To Its End.

One's attitude towards the Old Year's going depends on how life and living are regarded. Some folk see in the end of a year the closer approach of death and the nearer destruction of all that they value. For such the calendar is the symbol of a relentless, mocking, threatening fate. They dread the day when December yields to January.

But to others the calendar is only a convenient and usable classification of time. Yesterday, today and tomorrow, last year and next year are inextricably linked together. The past is cherished, the present is used and the future pleasantly beckons. Deeds connect with dates. Plans are measured in months and years. Time is a stream of opportunity and achievement.

Two elements of character enable the latter attitude to become an habitual one. There must be engagement in industry of such a character as to involve sowing, cultivating and harvesting. Happy people experience a joy in work by discerning in their labors the connections between past, present and future. The activities of a day are not chips from a log nor ravelings from the loom, but parts of a structure and the web of a fabric. Experience produce both results ai ideals.

Hope is a second element which keeps the calendar in its place of secondary importance. One removes December's leaf in order to reach the days of January. The possibilities of more days are as fascinating to the mind rightly adjusted to the continuity of life as is the contemplation of what has been done. "Hope springs eternal in the human breast" because there is no actual termination to the action in which the soul is able to engage.

The hope of the Christian is of such a scope that no calendar can be its measure. It has visions for the angle tomorrow and for ages on ages yet to come. And by divine conservation, the entirety of the past and the fulness of the present are related to that future.

Bible Lessons in Childhood.

Margaret C. Worthington.

The thoughts below have been gathered together through the impressions left by a conversation with a Christian woman regarding her Sunday-school class of small children.

The Lord's Day teaching in the Sunday school is necessarily limited to a short period in a week. Prayer will "multiply the seed sown" in the power of the Holy Spirit. But the normal child lives in a home all the week. And in God's special command for the instruction of the little ones He certainly places the first responsibility on parents, according to Ex. 12:26 and Deut. 6:6, 7. A mother gathering her children around her for daily Bible reading and prayers is among the writer's earliest recollections—a goodly heritage.

Our Creator has given to childhood a vivid imagination with a memory to receive and retain impressions. This is prepared ground for the reception of holy, or unholy, knowledge.. He speaks of the good seed He has prepared for that ground when He says: These words, which I command thee, . . . thou shalt teach them diligently to thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up." But if the imaginations is fed on incessant "fables" and inflamed for "the flesh" by theatrical representations, the mind is given prepossession with just those things that please "the god of this world".

Regarding the ancient Passover Feast of the Jews. God knew their children would naturally ask, "What mean ye by this service?" And it was to be explained to them. Any child would be interested in the preparations for the yearly journey to the royal city. Eye and ear gate would be open and anticipation on edge. And they could not but apprehend the prime object of going, the killing of the sacrificial lamb, especially being themselves partakers of it while they would be pointed back to the first Passover on the night of the Exodus, and be told Jehovah's Word, "When I see the blood, I will pass over you." For it was the express part of the command that they should learn of the atonement—shadowing forth the great propitiation on Calvary. This is the first precise command in the Bible for instruction of children. And why, therefore, would not "the law of first mention" apply here? It has been observed that the first mention of a subject in the Bible is the key to its meaning through the whole Book. The subject for the first time mentioned here is the Gospel for the child. The purpose was to have the child understand salvation taught in the simplest way and most vivid manner for faith to accept.

A minister who makes Bible teaching for children a principal part of his vovcation, says, that for memory verses he chooses lines of fundamental truth. Let us do the same. In illustration we see Agraham's son, Isaac, clearly understood there was no acceptable worship without the lamb (Gen. 22: 5, 7). Men may not worship the Lord on earth nor in heaven without the Lamb (Rev. 21: 22. 23, 27).

Repetition of a story they love does not tire the interest of children. The Old Testament is full of true stories. And the New Testament has details which add clearness to perception of the facts, and which should be strictly adhered to, while proper inferences should be made for young minds, and choice of such details as best suit their comprehension.

Israelite children would also have the triumphal song of Miriam, that of Deborah and Barak, and other songs. The old Welsh bards chanted the praises of God, and kept alive much of their history by song and poetry. King David, the "sweet Psalmist of Israel", gave by the Holy Spirit the most part of the Hebrew Psalter to his people, and to all believers of all lands. The rhythm helps memory to delight in psalms learned in childhood even down to old age. And in childhood is the hour for memorizing.

The Rev. R. C. McQuilkin writes: "One of the great facts about children and young people is that they can be led and will follow their teachers. God has planned it so." In this respect a truth has been voiced by another Christian man who said that "when he planted a young rose-tree he placed beside it a good, strong stake, that it might grow straight till able to support itself." It should not be left to young people just to pick up what they may of Bible knowledge. They need guidance, both of the way and how to walk in it. Our Lord, at the age of twelve stopped at the Temple to hear and ask questions of the doctors there. Indeed we do not see Him as "Very Man" as well as "Very God" entirely independent and ready to enter His mission till full manhood had arrived. At least so it appears to us.

Only one word more. A patient in a hospital, who has a sickly husband too, and her herself works at a factory, lately told the writer with pleasure of teaching the Scripture in an orphanage, beside her Sunday-school class. God gives opportunities to those who are eager to use them for Him.

THE HOLY NIGHT.

That night when in the Egyptian skies
The mystic Star dispensed its light,
A blind man turned him in his sleep
And dreamed that he had sight.

That night when shepherds heard the song
Of hosts angelic choiring near,
A deaf man lay in slumber's spell
And dreamed that he could hear.

That night when in the cattle's stall
Slept Child and mother in humble fold,
A cripple turned his twisted limbs
And dreamed that he was whole.

That night when o'er the new-born Babe
A tender mother rose to learn,
A loathsome leper smiled in sleep
And dreamed that he was clean.

That night when to the mother's breast
The little King was held secure,
A harlot slept a happy sleep
And dreamed that she was pure.

That night when in the manger lay
The Holy One who came to save,
A man turned in the sleep of death
And dreamed there was no grave.

A NEW YEAR'S WISH.

How quickly little willing hands
Put every toy away.
How easy little willing hands
Make all their work and play!
With willing hands the moments run,
And all day long is full of fun.

If I might wish a New Year's wish
For home and foreign lands,
I'd ask that every child might have
A pair of willing hands.
Oh! don't you wish it would come true?
Perhaps there'd be a pair for you!

The New Leaves.

"Wake up!" said a clear little voice. Tommy woke up and sat up in bed. At the foot of the bed stood a boy about his own age, all dressed in white, like fresh snow. He had very bright eyes, and he looked straight at Tommy.

"Who are you ?" asked Tommy.

"I am the New Year!" said the boy. "This is my day, and I have brought you your leaves."

"What leaves?" asked Tommy.

"The new ones, to be sure," said the New Year. "I hear bad accounts of you from my Daddy—"

"Who is your Daddy?" asked Tommy.

"The Old Year, of course!" said the boy. "He said you asked too many needless questions, and I see he was right. He says you are greedy, too, and that you sometimes pinch your little sister, and that one day you threw your reader into the fire. Now, all this must stop."

"Oh, must it?" said Tommy. He felt frightened and did not know just what to say.

The boy nodded. "If it doesn't stop," he said, "you will grow worse and worse every year, till you grow up into a Horrid Man. Do you want to be a Horrid Man?"

"N-no!" said Tommy.

"Then you must stop being a horrid boy!" said the New Year. "Take your leaves!" and he held out a packet of what looked like copybook leaves, all sparkling white, like his own clothes.

"Turn over one of these leaves every day," he said, "and soon you will be a good boy instead of a horrid one."

Tommy took the leaves and looked at them. On each leaf a few words were written. On one it said, "Help your mother!" On another, "Don't pull the cat's tail!" On another, "Don't eat so much!" And on still another, "Don't fight Billy Jenkins!"

"Oh!" cried Tommy, "I have to fight Billy Jenkins. He said—"

"Good-by!" said the New Year. "I shall come again when I am old, to see whether you have been a good boy or a horrid one. Remember—

"Horrid boy makes horrid man;
You alone can change the plan."

He turned away and opened the window. A cold wind blew in and swept the leaves out of Tommy's hand. "Stop! stop!" he cried. "Tell me—" But the New Year was gone, and Tommy, staring after him, saw only his mother coming into the room. "Dear child," she said. "Why the wind is blowing everything about."

"My leaves! My leaves!" cried Tommy, and jumping out of bed he looked all over the room, but he could not find one.

"Never mind," said Tommy. "I can turn them just the same, and I mean to. I will not grow into a Horrid Man." And he didn't.—Selected.

The Christmas of the Centuries.

Cassie Moncure Lyne, Jr.

One of the most beautiful legends of Yuletide is the story of Sabotka, the good fairy of the Russians, who in ye olden days lived somewhere in that mystical land near Damascus, or Mesopotamia or Bagdad, since localities matter not in tales of genii, but the period was the time of the Star in the East. Sabotka was very poor and humble; but her lone dwelling furnished rest and refreshment to three of the Magi, who, with gifts of gold and frankincense and myrrh, were journeying onward, seeking a new era of Peace and good will to men. Sabotka learned that a "Little Child" was leading them; an unseen presence of holy innocence; and that through Him was to come a time when kindliness and charity would rule the world. Already the Wise Men had divined His Nativity and were carrying their first Christmas offerings to this little Jesus in far-off Bethlehem. Now, Sabotka, being a woman and loving babies, longed to go with them; but before day broke, the camels had started; and the sands of the desert covered up their trackless path. Hence Sabotka had to seek the Saviour alone. She, too, would carry an offering, fitting with her means, like the widow's mite. So she baked cakes with raisins and with her humble basket on her arm, left home to follow the desire now dearest to her heart—to find the Christ Child. But she was old; the distance great; and the description given by the Wise Men was vague; so she lost her way. Every little child, however, whom she met, she felt might be the Child of God. for who knew? So to every little hand outstretched, she offered a cake; and though she never reached Bethlehem, the story of her kindness has come down to all Russia, whose peasants place their sabots outside the door even now on Christmas Eve, with the prayer that good old Sabotka may leave them cheer.

This is simply another version of Van Dyke's Story of "The Other Wise Man".

Eva Goes To a New Year Party.

Twelve-year-old Eva Dentler looked frowningly at the cream-colored dress her mother was pressing so carefully. "Must I wear that old dress to Bertha Spagler's New Year party?" asked Eva, puckering up her lips.

"Yes, dear," answered her mother. "I had hoped so much to have been able to have gotten you a new dress for the holidays anyway; but you know I have had less sewing to do this winter than ever, and things are higher, so I've tried to brighten up this old dress again. It's real good yet, Eva, even if it was first made three years ago out of your grandmother's dress. You see, I could fix it to be in the latest style again, and that is something."

"I wish grandmother hadn't had so many good things," grumbled Eva, "and then maybe I would get some new things. I've just a good notion not to go to the party, but I want to see that rich Mrs. Petzel, who is visiting Bertha's aunt. They say she is such a grand dresser.'

"But you've never been to a New Year's party before," protested her mother, "and your dress will look quite pretty. At least it fits you, and I have tried to make it look as nice as I could, and some of the girls' dresses don't do that."

Eva knew that her mother spoke the truth, for even she was aware that Leon Craig's new pencil blue silk dress did not fit her nicely, although Madame LeSinge had made it. And she had heard Opal Staley's mother that very morning fussing about the dress she had got for her daughter from Chicago because it did not hang right.

That night Eva's mother dressed her little daughter with greater care than usual; and when at last the little girl looked at herself in the mirror, she had to admit her dress fitted nicely. "But, oh! if I could only have another colored dress for once, or something else!" she sighed.

Most of the guests had already gathered at Bertha's house when Eva arrived; but seeing many familiar faces, Eva was not afraid, and by and by Mrs. Spagler came to her and began to talk.

"Where, there is Eva Dentler with that old dress of her grandmother's on again!" laughed Opal, and, overhearing the remark tears came into Eva's eyes.

"Come here, Mrs. Petzel, I want you to meet the sweetest little girl," called Mrs. Spagler, hoping that Eva had not heard the unkind remark.

"I'd stayed at home if I didn't have nothing nicer to wear," returned Leon, pulling at the ruffle of her pencil blue silk dress which kept creeping up her arm.

"Why, my dear!" smiled Mrs. Petzel, and put her hand in Eva's, while the other girls looked on enviously.

Eva tried to keep back the tears, but at the kindly smile she gegan to cry.

"Why, my dear little girl, why are you crying so?" asked Mrs. Petzel, and without waiting to be urged more, Eva told about the dress and the unkind remarks she had overheard.

Mrs. Petzel took the little girl on her knee, seeming not to care if she crushed her smart, smoothly pressed gown. "Why," she began, "do you know I am ever so glad you wore that dress and—and I met you, for you see I have decided to stay here all the rest of the winter and spring, and I have ever so many clothes to be made, and I just can't stand Madame LeSinge's sewing. Why, your dress is just a darling and is made the very nicest of any gown here. Do you think your mother would sew for me?"

"Oh, yes, I know she would!" exclaimed Eva, "for she hasn't had much to do, and now I'm ever so glad I came to the party and wore this dress. It will be a real New Year all year now if you help us."

And Mrs. Petzel thought of the many pretty things she would get for this little girl who was brave enough to help her mother in this way.—Exchange.

Little Mary's New Year Cards.

On the morning of the first day of the new year little Mary flew to the door to meet the postman the moment she heard his whistle, as he came up the front steps. "Happy New Year, Mr. Postman!" she cried.

"I'm sure I wish you the same and many of them," said the jovial postman with a smile as big as his mouth would stretch. "And it looks as if a lot of other folks are wishing you a happy New Year, too," he continued as he began to sortout cards from his bundle and to place them one at a time in little Mary's hand.

"O-o-o-o-h!" exclaimed little Mary, her eyes growing bigger and bigger as she hopped first on one foot and then on the other. "Why, it's most as nice as getting Christmas presents again, isn't it?"

"Nicer in some ways," said the smiling postman as he shouldered his bag again and was gone.

In another minute or two mamma was reading aloud the cards that were addressed to little Mary, for sometimes handwriting puzzled her a little in spite of her year at kindergarten and her half year in school.

The cards had come from all over, as Brother Jack expressed it. One was from New York from Uncle Billy, and one from Chicago from Aunt Mary and one from—yes, sir, from far-away Paris, where Uncle Jack was studying art. And with these mamma had really only begun to read the handful of postcards.

When he last card had been read at least twice and mamma had turned back to the letters she had been writing, little Mary sat for a while looking at the pictures on the cards and re-reading the verses that were on some of them. Finally she looked up: "Mamma, where did postcards come from?"

"Why, they come from everywhere, dear. Your cards have come from Uncle Billy and—"

"No, mamma, I mean who started postcards? Have people always sent cards to each other for ever and ever?"

Mamma laughed as she laid aside her pen again. "What a grown-up question for a little girl," she said. "Suppose you and I see if we can find the answer to it."

She got a big book from the bookcase and began to turn the pages. 'Here it is," she said at last. "It says that postcards were first used in Austria, a land far across the sea, by a Professor Herrmann. That was a long time ago when your grandmamma was a wee little girl, smaller than you are now. Every year since then the idea has spread and spread until now at Christmas time and New Year's Uncle Sam has to have a lot of extra clerks in the postoffices to take care of the cards people send to each other—millions and billions of them—wishing a Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year."

Little Mary clapped her hands. "Aren't you glad Professor Herrman thought of it, mamma?" shes aid happily. "It's nice to make people happy by remembering them with a card. Next year I'm going to send bushels and bushels of cards to everybody."

And away she skipped to read her New Year all over again.—William T. MIElroy, in Christian Advocate.

What the World Does On New Year's.

The Chinese do not believe in wasting time—not even for a birthday. Therefore, every Chinese has his birthday on New Year's Day. It doesn't matter when he was born—maybe in April or July—but in that highly systematical land every man, woman and child save up their birthdays until New Year's Day. Then, when as one huge body of people they all have attended to this ceremony, they can go back to their work with a clear conscience, knowing that they have not wasted any time on unnecessary holidays during the year.

But the Chinese—a very honest nation—have a still more practical custom for that day, one that we might well imitate. On New Year's Day every man tries to pay every penny that he owes. If he cannot face his fellow men on New Year's Day as a person free from all debts, he feels deeply mortified and stays within doors. Naturally the result is that everybody one meets on the streets on that day of the year looks exceedingly happy.

The Chaldeans and Persians thousands of years ago, tried to make their world happier by setting great numbers of prisoners free on the first day of the year. The Romans had a good Janus with two faces, looking two ways—from which god we got our word January—and on New Year's Day thousands of Romans flocked to the temple to offer a sacrifice of cakes made of meal, wine, and olive oil.

In time Rome grew to be the richest nation of her day through conquest and trade, and her wealthy citizens at length adopted the custom of presenting on New Year's Day gifts costly beyond all modern understanding. In fact, the presents to the emperors or Caesars, as the rulers were called, became so magnificent, so unreasonably expensive, that the Emperor Claudius felt compelled to issue a declaration limiting the value of them. Finally the thing happened that might naturally have been expected. All this wealth and the lavish expenditure caused New Year's Day to degenerate into a period of such riotous and degrading actions that the Christian Church forbade its members to take part in the festivities. The result was that for a long time all the Christians observed the day simply as a time of fasting and prayer.

Of course, however, the world in general could not accept any such gloomy view of a day that is considered so full of bright hopes for a better future. As Christianity spread over Europe, this custom is every country of being uncommonly happy on New Year's Day was transferred into the new religion. Thus, in Northern Europe, for instance, where a strange set of priests called Druids controlled the old religion, it had long been a ceremony on New Year's Day to cut the mistletoe, the symbol of friendship, from the oak and allow it to drop into a white sheet held by priests. Then the mistletoe was draped about the necks and horns of two young white bulls, and after songs and prayers and mystic ceremonies the animals were sacrificed on a vast stone altar.

Turn to modern times and go clear across the globe to the present-day Japanese and you will find the same tendency to consider New Year's Day a special time of happiness. Nowhere is the day made more of than in the Flowery Kingdom. All food for this particular holiday must be cooked the day before; for the first twenty-four hours of the year are sacred, and only a sinner would labor at such a time. Early in the morning the streets and the windows begin to glow with wonderfully tinted Japanese lanterns; everybody, even the very old and infirm, appears in gaily colored clothes; all children are decorated with flowers.

Early in the morning, also, the priests of the curious Shinto religion begin the most strenuous day of the whole year's work; for they must visit every home in their parishes, recite a portion of the Shinto service, and drink a little wine in each house—which often makes too much for some of the priests before evening comes! And then what curious gifts! A popular one is a polished mussel shell as a warning against wastefulness and high living. For this present reminds the receiver of the ancient day when the founders of the Japanese nation lived a life so simple that the mussel was their only meat.—Firelight.

THE OPENING DOOR.

F. B. Stone.

The New Year's door is opening now,
And may we enter there,
To meet its joys, its pain, its cares,
Prepared for all by prayer.

And may it be a blessed year,
Transcending all our thought,
Blest with the presence of our Lord,
The vision from Him caught.

And may that vision ever lead
Us past the lesser things,
To ever higher, greater ones,
Through using faith's strong wings,

So may we live and do the work,
God plans for me, for you,
And 'mid the glitter of the false
Hold firmly to the true.

What Mary Saw.

Condensed from a Woman's Auxiliary Leaflet.

Mary's going to town was always an event. In the first place it generally meant some delightful occasion in prospect. But if only a shopping expedition, it was still exciting. There was so much to talk over beforehand: every one was sure to have a commission, and there were so many discussions about each one. This morning she was going on her father's early train. There had been a long talk with mother the night before; every child had had a visit from her at bedtime; there was a long list in her pocket-book, with just enough money for the must-bes, and one little secret sum beside of Mary's own.

But why Mary went to town that day and how she did the things she went to do are none of our concern. What we are to hear about is the unexpected thing she saw. It was a few minutes before nine, and she had just come from the store where her first purchases had been made. Across the way stood a great church, one that Mary had often noticed but never entered, though there was a board upon it calling the busy passer-by to come apart and rest awhile. Mary was not tired, she did not want to rest; she had never thought before of going into a church, except at service time. What made her walk across the street today and open the outer door and enter in? Who knows?

She stepped forward and took her place just within the inner door. Others were standing there beside her, for the church was full—she had never seen a church so full. Every seat was taken. There were benches against the walls; wherever an extra chair could be put a chair was set. But all were standing, and Mary saw at once that all the great congregation were women. In the far-off chancel she could dimly see one or two Bishops and other clergymen, but the choir was of women, and they were singing, and so were all the congregation, and the only men among them were the men who were passing down the aisles, with the almsbasins in their hands. Mary's eyes were fixed on these. She saw them passed along the standing rows and come back to the aisles with growing piles of envelopes and bills. She saw the eager faces watching and the eager hands outstretched to give, and through it all she heard the sweet refrain:

"Holy offerings, rich and rare,
Offerings of praise and prayer,
Purer life and purpose high,
Clasped hands, uplifted eye,
Lowly acts of adoration
To the God of our salvation:
On His altar laid, we leave them:
Christ, present them! God, receive them."

What did it all mean? "How beautiful it all is!" thought Mary, and her heart beat, and the color rose in her cheeks, and the light deepened in her eyes. And meanwhile the men in the aisles were drawing nearer, bringing the almsbasins, piled ever higher and higher. Mary's eyes were on them, and a question came into her mind and asked itself again and again. "Shall I be the only one without a gift?" The men were very near; soon they would reach her and pass on. They would take all that treasure and offer it to God, and she have no part in it, unless she made haste. Mary took out her purse and from it that extra sum, the bit she had put in that morning for a surprise gift, a gift of love for mother dear. "We will give it together in this wonderful offering."

And so, among all the bills and the envelopes that hid so many checks, Mary dropped her silver coin of love and sacrifice. The men carried back the heaped-up treasure. Far away Mary could see the Bishop before the altar, raising a great basin of gold, gleaming in the sunshine, and heard the words, now subdued by holy awe, now swelling in adoring joy:

"To the Father, and the Son,
And the Spirit, three in One,
Though our mortal weakness raise
Offerings of imperfect praise,
Yet with hearts bowed down most lowly,
Crying, Holy! Holy! Holy!
On Thine altar laid, we leave them:
Christ, present them! God, receive them!"

In the prayer that followed, Mary made up her mind. She could not go away until that beautiful service was over. She would make good the time by staying longer; she would do all she had come in town to do; she would take back all they had expected of her; but besides she would gain this great thing, and it would be more than anything else for her mother and them all.

So for an hour longer she stayed, bound by such a spell of worshipping love as she had never felt before; absorbed in the sacred words, gaining by quick degree that preparation of the soul that drew her among the very last to kneel before the altar, presenting herself, renewing her allegiance, sharing again in the one great Offering, rendering thanks again for all it meant. And as she knelt there seemed to come to her heart the answer to the question that had been in the background of her mind ever since she stepped inside the church, "What mean ye by this service?"

For the first time in her life she felt herself to be one of a great Body, and the force of the united prayer and praise of all its members. Her thoughts flew beyond the limits of the dear home family, of the home parish, also dear; beyond that crowded church, to all Christian people, in town and country, throughout the world; and then—what was it that made her think that in this world there are people yet who do not know of Christ, who have never had that sense of glorious nearness which she was feeling then? For the first time in her life, Mary prayed a loving, earnest prayer for all of these.

The service was over. With hundreds of others, Mary passed down the aisle and out into the street. How strange it seemed? How different everything from that short hour before! Mary shut that hour up in the treasure box of her memory, and went to and fro on her errands till all were done, and then, laden with bundles, took her train for home. The train was full, and at the last moment a young woman hurried in and took the seat beside her, and as she looked at Mary, said in a pleased and friendly voice, "Why, met again!" It was her neighbor of the morning, who had handed her in church the paper with the hymns.

A moment before Mary had been thinking she would shut her eyes and in her trip from town go over every minute of that wonderful time; now she turned eagerly and said, "Tell me all about it. What did it mean?

"Don't you know?" cried the other.

"Twelve miles out," said Mary.

"And I have come from China," said the other, "and I've been counting on it, and looking forward to it these three years past."

"Where do you live?"

"Tell me," said Mary.

And so she told her. "It is our Thank Offering. It is what we all give, after our duty gifts are given, the extra given for pure love. "And Mary thought of her extra gift and sacrifice, and was thankful, too.

The train slackened. Mary gathered up her bundles and rose to go. The other held out her hand. "I am glad we met," she said. "You will never forget again, I know."

"I never heard before," said Mary.

That night they sat long over supper, and Mary told the story of her shopping, and showed her purchases, and every one was pleased. But later, as she sat with her mother, she told the great adventure of her day, and the wonderful things that she had seen and heard. And her mother learned of the surprise present she had missed, and gladly shared with Mary in her first United Thank Offering.

NEW YEARS—1930.

Charles Nevers Holmes.

Hands of time are creeping, creeping,
Creeping round their dials here,
Midnight comes and few are sleeping—
'Tis the death-bed of a Year.

Human hearts no more are sighing,
Cares and sorrows disappear,
All the past is dead and dying
On the birthday of a Year.

Many bells are ringing, ringing,
Jubilantly far and near,
Voices joyously are singing,
Welcoming the glad New Year.

Golden days will soon be dawning,
Everywhere are peace and cheer,
Clear and cloudless is the morning
At the advent of a Yyear.

THE WATER TEST.

At the Anderson Quarries, owned by the Winnsboro Granite Corporation in Fairfield County, South Carolina, and at the office at Rion, S. C., three water tests are made to grade stone. If the stone is flawless, of straight grain, no white or black streaks or splotches, no wave in the grain, it is graded as Winnsboro Granite, and sells at a higher price than ordinary granite. If any of these defects appear when water is thrown over the stone, it is not Winnsboro Granite, but is graded "Smith stock", and sold at a lower price.

Buyers of Winnsboro Granite should specify Winnsboro Granite in their purchase contracts, ask for quarry certificate, and also make the water test. Defects show up plainly when the stone is wet with water if there are any defects in the block. Dry stone does not show up defects so readily. Therefore, when buying Winnsboro Granite, wet the stone and see for yourself that you get certificate from the quarry through your dealer, to the effect that the stone used in your monument is Winnsboro Granite. With that certificate and with the water test, you can be sure that you have the best monumental material known to the world.

It costs a little more, but only 20 per cent. of monument cost is for material, so that the higher price of Winnsboro Granite means very little in the increase of the price of the monument; but it means a great deal in the satisfaction of knowing that it is the best monument possible—the most permanent, the most beautiful, flawless.

The Rev. Mr. Sterrett, in All Souls' Parish Bulletin, gives each week a note on some of the additions and changes in the Revised Prayer Book now ready for use. One addition of especial interest is the appropriate and beautiful service for the burial of a child.

At St. Thomas' Church the Rev. Dr. Smith is conducting a Bible Class for his congregation and their friends each Sunday evening. It is an open forum, questions and discussions being invited.

All Souls had a Community Christmas tree together with a carol service Christmas Eve on the front lawn of the church. The Sunday School presented a peagtn, the story of the Christ Child, sang carols and had its special children's service, with Christmas hymns. The congregation had an old-fashioned Christmas decoration evening to make garlends and hang greens in the church for its beautiful Christmas Day service.

Memorials.

On Sunday, December 22, at the 11 A. M. service at Calvary Episcopal Church, New York City, of which the Rev. S. M. Shoemaker, Jr., is rector, two windows were dedicated in the chapel. A large group of boys from the Children's Aid Society were in the congregation.

The second window is given in memory of Mr. Ewart Wendell by one of his old friends. Mr. Wendell's life was devoted to work for boys and the window depicts St. Christopher carrying the Christ Child.

Mr. Shoemaker preached at this service and at the six o'clock service.

United Christmas Carol Service.

Nearly one thousand children, representing the Church Schools of six of the leading Episcopal churches of New York City, gathered at four o'clock on Sunday afternoon (December 22), at All Angels' Church, at the United Christmas Carol Service, the first of its kind held in the city. The Church Schools were those of St. Michael's, St. Mary's (Manhattanville), St. Ignastius, St. Faith's (the Cathedral School of St. John the Divine); Christ Church, and All Angels. The united choirs of these schools, numbering two hundred children, gave a selected program of carols, under the leadership of Kyle Dunkel, organist and choiramaster, or All Angels. The choir was divided between the choir stalls and the gallery and sang antiuhonally in some of the numbers, with great beauty of effect.

Hundreds of candles were used to light the entire church interior.

Fiftieth Anniversary.

On Sunday, November 24, Christ Church Parish, Austin, Minnesota, celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of its organization as a parish. Bishop McElwain preached the anniversary sermon.

For a number of years the congregation of St. Mary's, Basswood Grove,

Minnesota, which is one of our churches in the open country, has been hoping to be able to build a community house in connection with their church. They have accomplished that this fall, and it was formally opened on the evening of November 8. In connection with this opening, three hundred people from the countryside and nearby villages sat down to dinner. It is hoped that this community house will take care, not only of such social service work as the Church itself may carry on, but will also prove to be a real center for the life of the community roundabout. Most of the manual labor connected with this building was done by the members of the congregation. The minister-in-charge is the Rev. Arthur Chard, who takes care of the work here in connection with his work at Hastings and Cannon Falls.

Seventy-Fifth Anniversary.

The seventy-fifth anniversary of Emmanuel Chapel, Mont Alto, was celebrated on Tuesday, October 22. Those taking part in the services were the Rev. George D. Graeff, of Chambersburg, the Rev. A. G. W. Pfaffko, of Blue Ridge Summit, and the Ven. Paul S. Atkins. The principal speakers were Bishop Darlington and Colonel Henry Wharton Shoemaker.

Emmanuel Chapel was founded in 1854. Henry Codman Potter, Seventh Bishop of New York, served here as a lay reader, while he was a student at the Virginia Theological Seminary. It was in Emmanuel Churchyard that Captain John Cook, of John Brown's Army was captured after the raid on Harper's Ferry in 1859. The Rev. William Heaton, who had given communion to John Brown a few days earlier, was an eyewitness of the capture. This historic event is commemorated by a marker erected by the Kittochtinny Historical Society. Two years ago, the restoration of Emmanuel Chapel was begun, and it is today one of the most attractive and picturesque country churches to be found anywhere. As it adjoins the campus of the State College of Forestry, its services are well attended by the students and members of the faculty, and it has a splendid opportunity to influence men who eventually will become leaders in rural communities.

THE CENTRAL SPHERE.

Clara Nye Jones.

Upon the scintillating tide
Of dawn's white light,
Her seven color-soldiers ride,
Defeating night,

Whose planets and bright moon would be Devoid of clear
Soft light, but for the brilliancy
Of central sphere.

Tongues, knowledge, wisdom, prophecy—
The things that are God's seven gifts to man must be
Each a dead star

Save as reflected day by day,
Upon their dun,
Cold orbs a penetrating ray
Of life's great sun.

But to a heart what color those Bright stars may bring,
As times great prisms decompose
Love's white day-spring!

Much To Be Thankful.

During a certain church conference, one of the speakers saw fit to launch into a tirade against universities, expressing gratification that he had never been corrupted by contact with a college. When he had been talking for some time the chairman interrupted.

"Do I understand the gentleman is grateful for his ignorance?"

"Yes," was the answer, "if you want to put it that way."

"Then," continued the chairman sweetly, "all I have to say is that you have much to be thankful for."—The Continent.

IN THE SCHOOL OF MALAYSIA.

In the schools of Malaysia
Are boys of every hue—
From China, the yellow;
From India, the black;
From Malaysia, the brown—
And they're good students, too.

Both the Chinese and Indians
Like shoes from the West.
With "Te-rom-pah" of hardwood,
Malay feet are dressed;
But when parents are poor
Going barefoot is best.

The wealthy Chinese
Buys a hat for his son;
The Indian wears
His black locks in the sun.
But fez of black velvet
Malay boys must don.

From a bowl, with his chopsticks,
The Chinese boy eats;
A plantan leaf holds
The Indian's food,
The Malay, with his fingers,
The both of them beats.
